immediately repaired. All farther efforts from the frigates being perfectly useless, the captain determined on taking possession of an island in the mouth of the harbour, and within musket-shot of the town. The ships were anchored, after the close of day, about four miles from the shore, and about eleven o'clock the same night 200 seamen, and all the marines, went under the orders of Lieutenant John McCurdy, senior lieutenant of the Belle Poule, accompanied by the officers and petty officers, and took possession of the island without opposition. With incessant labour and the most extraordinary exertions, a defence was thrown up, and a battery of four guns, (two howitzers and two 9-pounders) mounted on a commanding position by five o'clock. A field-piece was also placed at some distance to the left, to divide the attention of the enemy, who, aware of the operations, had been busily employed during the night in planting guns in various parts of the harbour. Soon after five a. m. the French opened a cross fire from four different positions, which was immediately returned, and kept up on both sides with great vigour for five hours, when the brig being cut to pieces and sunk, and of course the object of their landing accomplished, the guns, ammunition, &c. were all re-embarked with the most perfect order and regularity. This service was not performed without some loss, having had four killed and as many wounded belonging to the two ships.

Captain Parker, of his majesty's ship the Amazon, made a gallant and successful attack by the boats of the said ship, under the directions of Lieutenant Westphall, on an enemy's convoy near the Penmarks. One of the enemy's vessels having been cut off by the Amazon, the remainder, eight in number, ran on shore under the protection of a battery, and of a considerable number of troops; notwithstanding the fire from which Lieutenant Westphall succeeded in bringing out three and destroying the other five, without any loss.

Captain Sutton, of his majesty's sloop Derwent, captured La Rafleur French privateer, of Granville, manned with twenty men with small arms.

A letter from Captain Hawtayne to Admiral Young thus recorded the capture of a division of the enemy's gun-boats.

"His majesty's ship Quebec, Heligoland, Aug. 6.

"Sir,—I have to acquaint you with a very gallant achievement, (the capture of a division of the enemy's gun-boats), which has been performed by boats from this part of your squadron, under the direction of the first-lieutenant, Samuel Blyth, of the Quebec, who had the honor to command a party of brave officers and men that nobly seconded him.

"The weather was particularly fine and settled for this kind of service, and they had already captured and sent to me a vaisseau de guerre of the Douanes Imperiales, manned with an officer and twelve men (one of them was killed before she surrendered), and a merchant vessel which they were towing out; when, being near the island of Nordeney, on the 3d, four of the enemy's gun-boats were seen at anchor within.

"The enemy silently waited the attack, their guns loaded with grape and canister, (not using any round-shot), until the boats were within pistol range, when a discharge took place from the whole line. The first vessel was immediately boarded and carried, but the others with great bravery maintained themselves severally, until they found their vessels were no longer in their own possession.

"The loss sustained was, on our side, four killed and fourteen wounded; on that of the enemy, two killed and twelve wounded.—I have the honor to be, &c. C. HAWTAYNE."

"William Young, Esq. Admiral of the White."

The following account of a naval action during the summer, is extracted from a letter:

"The sufferings and exertions of the Brevedageren commenced on the 31st of July, and continued without intermission until the 2d of August, in opposing a Danish squadron, consisting of the Langeland brig, mounting twenty-two long 18-pounders, and 200 men; Logan and Keil brigs, mounting twenty and eighteen long 18-pounders, 175 men each. The English force consisted of the Algerine cutter, ten guns and sixty men, Lieutenant Blow; and Brevedageren, twelve guns, forty-seven men, Lieutenant Devon.

"On the evening of the 31st of July, our two ships observed three suspicious vessels standing towards them from the coast of Norway, which were soon discerned to be enemies; the wind being very light, the Algerine and Brevedageren continued going from them during the night, as fast as they were able, and at day-light found themselves about four miles from the advanced brig of the enemy, which appeared considerably distant from the two others. Lieutenant Blow, commanding the Algerine, being the senior officer, sent a boat to the Brevedageren, to inform Lieutenant Devon that it was his intention to attempt cutting this vessel off; and accordingly both the Algerine and Brevedageren tacked for that purpose, and commenced sweeping towards her, it being calm. The enemy observed this manœuvre, and prevented its being executed by closing his squadron. The Algerine and Brevedageren again sought safety by retreating. At four o'clock, a. m. 1st of August, the Danish commodore in the Langeland, being nearly within shot, the Algerine and Brevedageren again bore down to the attack, by desire of Lieutenant Blow. It must be observed, that the Danish commodore was at this time about two miles from his own squadron. The action was commenced about thirty minutes past eleven o'clock, with the Langeland—at twelve o'clock in close action. Soon after, the second enemy's brig commenced firing on the Algerine and Brevedageren, when the Algerine found it necessary to take to her sweeps, and hauled out of the action. The Brevedageren could not follow the example; consequently, she was left in the midst of three brigs of the enemy, each of them more than double her force. In this perilous situation, Lieutenant Devon, the gallant commander of the Brevedageren, resolved to fight as long as he could fire a gun; and the few brave fellows he commanded admirably supported his heroic resolution, never in the least betraying a symptom of fear, but, on the contrary, nobly cheered their commander in obeying every order. At half-past one, p. m. when scarcely a shadow of hope existed of saving the Brevedageren, a favorable breeze of wind sprung up, of which Lieutenant Devon availed himself to get off, and fortunately the enemy, intent on keeping up his fire, seemed not immediately to perceive it. Lieutenant Devon then directed to cease firing, and took to his sweeps, which, aided by a boat's crew of ten men, sent by the Algerine about the close of the action, and the breeze, gained nearly a mile on the enemy by two o'clock, who still continued his broadsides with an apparent intention to sink the Brevedageren, as all his shot fell low. The enemy perceiving the advantage gained over him, left off firing, and again every exertion was made on the one side to escape, and on the other to prevent it. The Brevedageren, however, preserved her distance, the Langeland continuing to annoy her with her chace-guns. At five, one of the other Danish brigs, the Logan, was advancing fast on the Brevedageren, and ranging upon her starboard quarter. At this time the Algerine cutter, who had much the advantage of the Brevedageren, from her superiority of sweeping, hove to, and attracted the enemy's attention. This manœuvre was of much advantage, as the enemy from this time did not gain the least upon the Brevedageren, and at sun-set he gave up the chace. Lieutenant Devon, however, not thinking himself safe so near such powerful and hostile neighbours, continued with his little crew labouring at the sweeps until twelve o'clock at midnight, when they literally fell from their oars, completely worn out. The wonder is how they could have stood it so long, having been closely engaged with so superior a force for upwards of an hour, besides tugging at the oar from six o'clock on Wednesday evening until Thursday at midnight.

"At day-light on Friday, the enemy was distant about six miles, but they did not resume the chace. Thus, by an exertion and perseverance not to be exceeded, was rescued from the Danes his majesty's brig, which they probably were the more anxious to possess, as she had formerly been taken from them. The Brevedageren had one man killed in the beginning of the action, and providentially only three wounded throughout the whole of the severe contest. She has, however, suffered much in her hull, masts, sails, and rigging, which I should presume would necessitate her going to England. To prevent the possibility of his colours being shot away, Lieutenant Devon had hoisted and nailed in different parts of his brig several English union-jacks; and to remind his brave fellows of the anniversary of the memorable 1st of August, he took from his cabin a likeness of the immortal Nelson, and made it fast to the mast."

An unpleasant affair took place on the 16th of May, between his majesty's ship Little Belt, and the American frigate President. About ten o'clock in the morning, the latter was perceived by Captain Bingham; but not knowing what she was, he made towards her, and on discovering her to be a frigate, carrying a broad pendant, he stood on a different tack. About six o'clock in the evening he observed the frigate standing towards him under a heavy press of sail, and about eight o'clock she was so close to him, that the stars in her pendant were very visible; and perceiving that it was the intention of the frigate to take him, he avoided the same, and at the same moment hailed to know what ship it was. No answer being returned, he again hailed, and was answered by a full broadside of round and grape shot. The action then commenced, and continued for three-quarters of an hour, when both at one moment ceased firing. Captain Bingham was hailed by Commodore Rogers, to know if he had struck, and informed him, at the same time, that it was the American frigate President; and was answered by Captain Bingham in the negative.

Night coming on, each ship commenced repairing damages, and on the following morning Commodore Rogers sent his lieutenant on-board the Little Belt, stating his regret at the circumstance; that he did not know she was a vessel of such inferior force, and requesting to conduct her into an American port to repair her damages, which Captain Bingham declined; but no explanation for his cowardly conduct took place. Captain Bingham had eleven men killed and twenty-two wounded. It was said that the President had been dispatched in search of his majesty's ship Guerriere, which had taken an English seaman out of an American coasting-vessel, to demand him; and, in case of refusal, to conduct the British frigate into New York.

It was apprehended that this business would be productive of some serious consequences. The BOOK IX. editor of one of the American papers, however, exercised his wit on the occasion, by saying, "a new play with an old title, She stoops to conquer, or The Mistakes of a Night, was performed with loud applause, on the 16th, off the coast of Virginia, by the President and Little Belt."

CHAP. IX.
1811.

A French privateer was gallantly repulsed by a British merchantman, the particulars of which were thus communicated by the captain.

"Three Sisters, off the Isle of Wight, Sept. 18.

"I have to acquaint you with a desperate engagement I have had with a French privateer, Le Fevre, mounting ten guns, six long sixes, and four 12-pound carronades, with swivels and small arms, manned with fifty-eight men, out from Brest fourteen days, in which time she captured the Friends schooner from Lisbon, belonging to Plymouth, and a large sloop from Scilly, with cod-fish and sundries, for Falmouth. On the 11th, at nine p. m. we observed her on the larboard bow; we were then steering N. N. E. about ten leagues from Scilly, and nearly calm.

"I immediately set my royals, fore-steering sails, and made all clear for action. At two a. m. when all my endeavours to escape were useless, she being within musket-shot, I addressed my crew, and represented the hardships they would undergo as prisoners, and the honor and happiness of being with their wives and families. This had the desired effect; and they immediately huzzaed with a desperation I never before witnessed, and made me confident of success. I ordered the action to commence, and endeavoured to keep a good offing, but which he prevented by running alongside, and immediately attempted to board, with a machine I never before observed, which was three long ladders, with points at the end that served to grapple us to them. They made three desperate attempts with about twelve men at each ladder, but were received with such a determination, that they were all drove back with great slaughter, and formed a heap for the others to ascend with greater facility.

"Finding us so desperate, they immediately, on their last charge failing, knocked off their ladders, one of which they were unable to unhook on our side, and left it with me, and sheered off; but I am sorry to say, without my being able to injure them, as they had shot away part of my rudder before they boarded me, and wounded several of my masts and yards; for it seemed to be their aim to carry away some of my masts, but which happily they did not effect. The most painful of my narrative is the loss of two men and a boy killed, and four wounded, but the wounded are doing well. Our whole crew amounted to twenty-six men and four boys, and deserve the highest applause that can be bestowed upon them.

(Signed) "GEORGE THOMPSON."

We shall conclude this chapter with the remarkable actions off Boulogne, which was thus detailed by Capt. Carteret.

"His majesty's ship Naiad, off Boulogne, 7 a. m. Sept. 21.

"SIR,—Yesterday morning, while this ship was lying at an anchor off this place, much bustle was observed among the enemy's flotilla, moored along shore close under the batteries of their bay, which appeared to indicate that some affair of unusual moment was in agitation. At about noon, Bonaparte, in a barge, accompanied by several other officers, was distinctly seen to proceed along their line to the centre ship, which immediately hoisted the imperial standard at the main, and lowered it at his departure, substituting for it a rear-admiral's flag; he afterwards visited others, and then continued in his boat for the rest of the evening.

"Since it is so much within the well-known custom of that personage to adopt measures that confer supposed eclat on his presence, I concluded that something of the kind was about to take place. Accordingly, seven praams, each having twelve 24-pounders long guns, with one hundred and twenty men, and commanded by Rear-admiral Baste, weighed and stood towards this ship, being expressly ordered by the French ruler, as I have since learned, to attack us. As the wind was S. W. with a very strong flood-tide setting to the N. E. while the enemy bore nearly south from us, it was clear that by weighing we could only increase our distance from him; so that our only chance of closing with him at all, was by remaining at anchor.

"The Naiad, therefore, quietly awaited his attack in that position, with springs on her cable.

"It was exclusively in the enemy's own power to choose the distance; each ship of his squadron stood within gun-shot, gave us successively her broadsides, tacked from us, and in that mode continuously repeated the attack. After this had so continued for three-quarters of an hour, ten brigs (said to have four long 24-pounders) and one sloop (said to have two such guns) also weighed and joined the ships in occasionally cannonading us, which was thus kept up for upwards of two hours without intermission, and returned, I humbly hope, with sufficient effect by this ship.

"At slack water the Naiad weighed her anchor and stood off, partly to repair some trivial damages, but chiefly by getting to windward, to be better enabled to close with the enemy, and get within shore of some at least of his flotilla. After standing off a short time, the Naiad tacked and made all sail towards them; but at about sun-set it became calm, when the enemy took up his anchorage under the batteries eastward of Boulogne, while the Naiad resumed here in her former position.

"In this affair not a British subject was hurt, and the damages sustained by this ship are too trifling for me to mention or report. I have, indeed, to apologize for dwelling so long on this affair, but my motive is the manner in which I understand it has been magnified by the enemy, and the extraordinary commendations which have been lavished on the Frenchmen engaged in it by their ruler. It is fitting, therefore, that his majesty's government should know the real state of the case, and the lords commissioners of the admiralty may rest assured, that every officer and man on board the Naiad did zealously and steadily fulfil his duty. I have the honor to be, &c.

"PHILIP CARTERET, Capt.

"Thomas Foley, esq. rear-admiral of the red," &c.

"His majesty's ship Naiad, off Boulogne, Sept. 21, 1811.

"SIR,—This morning, at seven o'clock, that part of the enemy's flotilla which was anchored to the eastward of Boulogne, consisting of seven praams, and fifteen smaller vessels, chiefly brigs, weighed and stood out on the larboard-tack, the wind being S. W. apparently to renew the same kind of distant cannonade which took place yesterday; different, however, from yesterday, for there was now a weather-tide. The Naiad, therefore, weighed, and getting well to windward, joined his majesty's brigs Rinaldo, Redpole, and Castilian, with the Viper cutter, who had all zealously turned to windward in the course of the night to support the Naiad in the expected conflict. We all lay-to on the larboard-tack, gradually drawing off-shore, in the hope of imperceptibly inducing the enemy also to withdraw farther from the protection of his formidable batteries.

"To make known the senior officer's intentions, no other signals were deemed necessary, but "to prepare to attack the enemy's van," then standing out, led by Rear-admiral Baste, and "not to fire until quite close to the enemy."

"Accordingly the moment the French admiral tacked in shore, having reached his utmost distance, and was giving us his broadsides, the king's small squadron bore up together with the utmost rapidity, and stood towards the enemy under all the sail each could conveniently carry, receiving a shower of shot and shells from the flotilla and batteries, without returning any, until within pistol-shot, when the firing on both sides of his majesty's schooners threw the enemy into inextricable confusion. The French admiral's praam was the principal object of attack by this ship; but as that officer in leading had of course tacked first, and thereby acquired fresh way, and was now under much sail, pushing with great celerity for the batteries, it became impossible to reach him without too greatly hazarding his majesty's ship. Having, however, succeeded in separating a praam from him, which had handsomely attempted to succour his chief, and which I had intended to consign to the particular care of Captains Anderson and McDonald, of the Rinaldo and Redpole, while the Castilian attacked others, it now appeared best preferably to employ this ship in effectually securing her.

"The Naiad accordingly ran her on-board; Mr. Grant, the master, lashed her alongside; the small arms-men soon cleared her decks, and the boarders, sword-in-hand, completed her subjugation. Nevertheless, in justice to our brave enemy, it must be observed, that his resistance was most obstinate and gallant, nor did it cease until fairly overpowered by the overwhelming force we so promptly applied. She is named La Ville de Lyons, was commanded by a Mons. Barbaud, who was severely wounded, and has on-board a Mons. La Coupé, who, as commodore of a division, was entitled to a broad pendant. Like the other praams she has twelve long guns, 24-pounders (French), but she had only one hundred and twelve men, sixty of whom were soldiers of the 72d regiment of the line. Between thirty and forty have been killed and wounded.

"Meanwhile the three brigs completed the defeat of the enemy's flotilla, but I lament to say, that the immediate proximity of the formidable batteries whereunto we had now so nearly approached, prevented the capture or destruction of more of their ships or vessels. But no blame can attach to any one on this account; for all the commanders, officers, and crews, did bravely and skilfully perform their duty. If I may be permitted to mention those who served more immediately under my own eye, I must eagerly and fully testify to the merits of, and zealous support I received from, Mr. Greenlaw, the first lieutenant of this ship, as well as from all the excellent officers of every description, brave seamen, and royal marines, whom I have the pride and pleasure of commanding.

"I have the honor herewith to inclose reports of our loss, which I rejoice to find so comparatively trivial, and that Lieutenant Charles Cobb, of the Castilian, is the only officer who has fallen. I have the honor to be, &c.

"P. CARTERET, Captain.

"Thomas Foley, esq. rear-admiral of the red," &c.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. IX.

1811.

CHAPTER X.

French Affairs.—Measures relative to Suppressed Printers.—Birth of young Napoleon.—Young Napoleon made King of Rome.—Remarks on the French and Austrian Alliance.—Flight of the Archduke Francis.—Baptism of the King of Rome.—Bonaparte's Speeches to the Legislative Body, and at the Meeting of a Council of Commerce.—Affairs of Spain.—Death of Romana.—Portugal.—Proclamation to the Portuguese.—Denmark.—Unsuccessful Attack on Anholt.—Great Britain.—Death of the Spanish Ambassador at Paddington.—Re-appointment of his Royal Highness the Duke of York to the Office of Commander-in-Chief.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. X.

1811.

THE French emperor, with consummate caution, maintained an entire control over the press in France. An imperial decree, of the 2d of February contained the following regulations relative to suppressed printers:—

“The printers retained in Paris are bound to purchase the presses of the suppressed printers; they shall pay for them according to the valuation which shall be set upon them, within the period of one year, and by four instalments.

“Each of the retained printers shall pay one sixtieth of the total price of this purchase.

“Immediately after the publication of this decree, seals shall be affixed on the types belonging to the suppressed printers.

“They may sell them if they please, provided they are sold only to licenced printers and type-founders.

“An indemnification shall be paid to the suppressed printers by those who are retained.

“This indemnification is fixed at the rate of 4,000 francs to every suppressed printer.

“It shall form one general fund, which shall be divided among the suppressed printers, in proportion to the extent and business of their printing establishment duly ascertained.

“For this purpose the suppressed printers shall be divided into classes.

“This division into classes shall be made, and the indemnification fixed by a commission.

“Each of the sixty retained printers shall pay a sixtieth of the sum total fixed for the indemnification due to the suppressed printers.

“Every creditor of the suppressed printers may object to the amount of the purchase-money, for the preservation of his rights.

“The commission shall consist of the inspector of the imperial press, who shall preside, of an auditor of the council of state, of two inspectors of books, and two licenced printers.”

Another decree of the same date ordered, that printers' licences should be delivered to them on parchment by the director-general of the press. The price of issuing these licences was fixed at fifty francs for Paris, and twenty-five francs for the other cities of the empire.

Though the retreat of Massena and the defeat of Victor were known in France towards the latter end of January, there was not the slightest allusion to these events in any of the French papers of that period. The birth of the young Napoleon seemed to have entirely engrossed the public attention for the moment. No expense was spared by the government to give all possible éclat to this event.

In any review of the state of Europe, France, not only from her magnitude, but still more from her ambition, necessarily obtruded herself as the main object of the picture. The aim of the Emperor Napoleon at this time was, to render France, according to his own term, and the original idea of Talleyrand, the centre of a system of public law and government; or, in other words, to occupy the place amongst the European nations, which was formerly possessed by the emperors of Germany amongst the electoral states. The young Bonaparte accordingly received the name of the King of the Romans, which was formerly the title of the prince appointed to succeed the emperor.

The object of the Emperor Napoleon was evidently a compromise with the house of Austria. The Emperor Francis had been persuaded to consider the family of Napoleon as his own, and therefore not to consider his own grandaun so much lost as transferred. The son of Napoleon being the grandson of the Emperor Francis, the splendid title of the King of the Romans, and the acknowledged supremacy amongst the European states, was still attached to the Austrian family.

Though this point of view was calculated to satisfy the Emperor Francis, it could not have been equally pleasing to the remainder of the Austrian family. It for ever excluded the archdukes from all hopes of the imperial thrones; it tended, in fact, to extinguish the greatness and sovereignty of the house of Austria, and most effectually to merge it in that of the house of Bonaparte. The connexion of Bonaparte and the house of Austria was merely with the Emperor Francis. If any accident, whether of nature or fortune, happened to the Emperor Francis, the family alliance would certainly not have been held in much respect by the archdukes, who were all discontented with the insignificance to which their house was reduced.

Such was the relative state of France and Austria; the alliance between them being rather between the Emperors Francis and Napoleon, than between the two families. The Emperor Francis, if the matter were considered in a mere selfish point of view, lost very little, and gained much; that is to say, he gained a splendid establishment for his daughter, and put himself into a state of security by winning over his enemy. On the other hand, the loss fell on the archdukes, who were supplanted by the family of Bonaparte.

It was natural, therefore, that such of the states of Europe, as, from their natural interests, were the enemies of France, should, at this time, keep a steady eye upon this principle of weakness in the French and Austrian alliance. The court of Petersburg could never forget that the alliance of France and Austria was necessarily an alliance against Russia, as the common object and purpose of Austria and Russia were necessarily to aggrandize themselves at the expence of Turkey. Turkey was the natural fund from which both Austria and Russia always sought their accession of dominion, each power naturally looking towards the attainment of that district or province which immediately bordered on itself, and which was incapable of defence. Accordingly France, as the son and ally of Austria, was consequently bound to assist the Emperor Francis in these objects of his ambition, and thereby necessarily oppose the immediate views of Russia. There was no hope or possibility of any compromise, France having another motive to assist these designs of Austria, inasmuch as any accession of dominion, or strength to the Russian empire, would be so much added to the actual power of an enemy of France.

The Archduke Francis was so disgusted at the slavery of his family, and ascendancy of the French in Vienna, as to be desirous of absenting himself from the scene of humiliation; and it was considered a singular coincidence, that the brother of Bonaparte, and the brother of the Emperor of Austria, equally ashamed of the Corsican's triumphs, should both, at the same time, seek an asylum beyond the reach of his power.

The motives of the Archduke Francis were not well understood; but, whatever they were, he succeeded in his attempt to escape. His flight from the Austrian dominions had hitherto been kept a profound secret. He left Vienna early in the spring, privately, with a suite of about ten persons, and travelled incog. under the title of a count, to Salonica, where he took shipping for Smyrna. There, after remaining a short time, an order arrived from the British admiral to Captain Peyton, of the Weazle gun-brig, to convey his royal highness and suite to Sardinia, where the party arrived in May: it being given out that his highness came merely on a visit to the King and Queen of Sardinia, the latter of whom being nearly related to him.

The Archduke was much pleased with his voyage from Smyrna, and particularly with the attentions of Captain Peyton, the grandson of Admiral Peyton, of Greenwich, and nephew to the two late Admirals Peyton. Captain Peyton was invited to dine with the King and Queen of Sardinia, the Archduke, &c.; and, in return, he gave a ball on the king's birth-day (4th of June) to their majesties and the Archduke, on board his ship. The singularity of the place and scene delighted the royal personages: it was the first English ship of war on-board of which the queen had ever been, and she was in high spirits on the occasion. Her majesty danced with Captain Peyton: to whom, and to his officers, in return for this unusual and unexpected entertainment, a fête-champetre was given, followed by a masked ball at the theatre; while the crew of the Weazle were regaled with the best productions of the island in abundance. The Archduke afterwards presented Captain Peyton with a gold snuff-box, having his initials on it, set with brilliants; as a token of his esteem of the captain, in consequence of his conduct.

On the 20th of March, at nine in the evening, the King of Rome was christened in the Thuilleries chapel. His majesty, the emperor, accompanied by the princes, princesses, and great dignitaries, was followed by two witnesses of the ceremony, the great officers, ministers, the grand eagles of the legion of honor, military officers, pages bearing flambeaux, and the heralds of arms. The chapel had been prepared for his majesty the emperor with a fautueil, surmounted by a canopy, and provided with a praying-desk. The King of Rome, preceded by his officers, was carried by his governess; M. the Marshal Duke of Congliano carried the end of his mantle. The galleries of the chapel were filled by the persons belonging to the court. His majesty was received at the gate of the church by his eminence the cardinal grand almoner, who presented to him the blessed water. He was seated betwixt the altar and the balustrade, upon a tapestry of white velvet, a stand of granite, surmounted by a magnificent vermillion vase, forming the baptismal font. The two sponsors were, the Archduke Grand Duke of Wurtzburg, uncle of the empress, and Prince Eugene, the late empress's son. On the right of the altar were the cardinals; on the left, the bishops, in their robes, &c. All having taken their proper places, the cardinal grand almoner sang the Veni Creator, accompanied by the music of the chapel. After the hymn, his eminence approached the seat, towards which his majesty advanced with the child and the sponsors, and presented the infant to be baptised. This ceremony was followed by Te Deum, sung by all the music of the chapel. During the Te Deum, the King of Rome, carried by his governess, and attended by his state officers, by an aide-de-camp of the emperor, four chamberlains, two grooms, and a master of the ceremonies, preceded by four pages, was carried back to his apartment. M. the Count of Lacépède, grand chancellor of the legion of honor, and M. the Count of Marescalchi, grand chancellor of the order of the iron crown, after having received the orders from the emperor, carried the grand cordon of these orders to the King of Rome. During the ceremony, a beautiful display of artificial fire-works, and the most brilliant illuminations throughout the whole city, amused the French people.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. X.

1811.

On the 22d of March, the emperor being on his throne, surrounded by the princes of his family, and all the great officers of state, an address was presented to him by the senate, in which it was stated that the happiness of his people was his first object. The emperor replied thus:—

“The testimony of France goes directly to my heart. The great destiny of my son will be accomplished. With the love of the French every thing will be easy for him. I am pleased with the sentiments you express.”

The council of state was presented by the prince, arch-chancellor of the empire, and made a similar address.—His majesty replied:—

“I have eagerly desired what Providence has granted me. My son will live for the happiness and glory of France. Our children will devote themselves for her happiness and glory. I thank you for the sentiments which you express.”

On the 16th of June the French emperor proceeded from the palace of the Thuilleries, in great state, to the palace of the legislative body. Discharges of artillery announced his departure from the Thuilleries, and his arrival at the palace of the legislative body.

The empress, Queen Hortense, Princess Pauline, the Grand Duke of Wurtzburg, and the Grand Duke of Frankfort, were in one tribune; the corps diplomatique in another tribune; the bishops convoked for the council, and the mayors and deputies of the good cities, summoned to be present at the baptism of the King of Rome, were on benches.

His majesty placed himself on his throne; the King of Westphalia, the princes, grand dignitaries, grand eagles of the legion of honor, occupied their accustomed places about his majesty; Prince Jerome Napoleon on his right.

After the new members had been presented, and taken the oaths, the emperor made the following speech:—

“Gentlemen deputies of departments to the legislative body,—The peace concluded with the Emperor of Austria has been since cemented by the happy alliance I have contracted—the birth of the King of Rome has fulfilled my wishes, and satisfies my people with respect to the future.

“The affairs of religion have been too often mixed and sacrificed to the interests of a state of the third order. If half Europe has separated from the church of Rome, we may attribute it specially to the contradiction which has never ceased to exist between the truths and the principles of religion which belong to the whole universe, and the pretensions and interests which regarded only a very small corner of Italy. I have put an end to this scandal for ever. I have united Rome to the empire. I have given palaces to the popes at Rome and at Paris. If they have at heart the interests of religion, they will often sojourn in the centre of the affairs of christianity. It was thus that St. Peter preferred Rome to an abode even in the Holy Land.

“Holland has been united to the Empire; she is but an emanation of it—without her the Empire would not be complete.

“The principles adopted by the English government not to recognise the neutrality of any flag, have obliged me to possess myself of the mouths of the Ems, the Weser, and the Elbe, and have rendered an interior communication with the Baltic indispensable to me. It is not my territory that I wished to increase, but my maritime means.

“America is making efforts to cause the freedom of her flag to be recognised—I will second her.

“I have nothing but praises to give to the sovereigns of the confederation of the Rhine.

“The union of the valais has been foreseen ever since the act of mediation, and considered as necessary to conciliate the interests of Switzerland with the interests of France and Italy.

“The English bring all the passions into play. One time they suppose France to have all the designs that could alarm other powers, designs which she could have put in execution if they had entered into her policy. At another time they make an appeal to the pride of nations, in order to excite their jealousy. They lay hold of all circumstances which arise out of the unexpected events of the times in which we are. It is war over every part of the continent that can alone ensure their prosperity. I wish for nothing that is not in the treaties I have concluded. I will never sacrifice the blood of my people to interests that are not immediately the interests of my empire. I flatter myself that the peace of the continent will not be disturbed.

"The King of Spain is come to assist at this last solemnity. I have given him all that was necessary and proper to unite the interests and hearts of the different people of his provinces. Since 1809, the greater part of the strong places in Spain have been taken after memorable sieges. The insurgents have been beat in a great number of pitched battles. England has felt that this war was approaching its termination, and that intrigues and gold were no longer sufficient to nourish it. She found herself therefore obliged to change the nature of it, and from an auxiliary she is become a principal. All she has of troops of the line have been sent into the Peninsula—England, Scotland, and Ireland, are drained. English blood has at length flowed in torrents, in several actions glorious to the French arms. This conflict against Carthage, which seemed as if it would be decided in fields of battle, on the ocean, or beyond the seas, will henceforth be decided in the plains of Spain! When England shall be exhausted, when she shall at last have felt the evils which for twenty years she has with so much cruelty poured upon the continent, when half her families shall be in mourning, then shall a peal of thunder put an end to the affairs of the Peninsula, the destinies of her armies, and avenge Europe and Asia by finishing this second Punic war.

"Gentlemen deputies of departments to the legislative body,—I have ordered my minister to lay before you the accounts of 1809 and 1810. It is the object for which I have called you together. You will see in them the prosperous state of my finances. Though I have placed within three months 100 millions extraordinary at the disposal of my ministers of war, to defray the expences of new armaments which then appeared necessary, I find myself in the fortunate situation of not having any new taxes to impose upon my people; I shall not increase any tax, I have no want of any augmentation in the imposts."

The sitting being terminated, his majesty rose and retired amidst acclamations.

In his speech at a meeting of a council of commerce, about the beginning of summer, Bonaparte still railed against England:—

"I have," said he, "deliberately weighed my resources with those of England—my situation with hers; and though the balance was decidedly in my favor, I have offered her peace upon honourable conditions. I have gone so far as even to offer to give up Holland. She was not at all disposed to listen; and I have proved to her, that though I menaced her with total ruin, I should advance nothing which I could not put in execution. I have the means of equipping many fleets, and of repairing the losses and checks they might experience. It was not with ambitious views that I have united all the coasts of the north with France; I owed it to the system of blockade which I have established by my decrees of Berlin, and which I desire to have observed with the most strict severity. See me, then, master of all the coasts of the Baltic.

"Yes, sirs, I am, and always will be, the master of the Baltic. The Emperor of Russia has not, indeed, as yet caused my decrees to be observed in his ports; but he will, ere six months, or I declare war against him. Since Tilsit, what prevented my march to Petersburg? that which I did not do, I can do yet. The struggle with England is distressing. I know it—but the issue cannot be doubtful. My resources are real, they are from territorial revenues; and those of my enemy rest only on credit; and, of course, as illusory as the feeble basis of commercial operations on which they are founded. I have now in my coffers 200 millions, (he repeated, stamping with his feet,) 200 millions, which shall be better employed than in purchasing sugar, and coffee, and cocoa—they shall serve to sap the power of those who have these only for the representatives of power. I am not ignorant that in pursuing my system with vigour, many fortunes will be ruined: but they will be those only who have been so imprudent as to make speculations beyond their means, or have chosen to become the bankers and agents of England. Sons of Mr. Martin, sons of Andre, here present—you furnish an example. All those who follow the same course will have the same loss. If I was King of Bourdeaux, or of Marseilles, or indeed of Holland, I should act probably as others have done; but I am at the head of a great empire, and of a numerous population, and it is not for me to sacrifice the general good to serve a few towns.

"All Europe has been too long tributary to England—her monopoly should be destroyed, and it shall be by me. If I was only Louis XIV. she might yet a long time condemn the force of France; but I have many more means than the greatest of her kings, and all shall be employed to effect her fall."

Till the battles of Barrosa, Albuera, &c. revived the drooping cause, the patriots of Spain were evidently losing ground. The Spanish army lost their brightest ornament by the death of the Marquis de la Romana, after a short illness, January 23. He was not only an upright patriot, but a strenuous and zealous defender of the cause in which the Spaniards were at this time engaged.

It was truly gratifying to English feelings, that the insolent boast of the French emperor, that "England could not contend singly against France," was retorted upon him by the signal defeat of the French in Portugal.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. X.

1811.

Marshal Beresford ably followed up the success and glory of Lord Wellington, which occasioned the following Proclamation of the Governors of the Kingdom of Portugal and of the Algarves.

"Portuguese,—The day of our glory is at last arrived; the troops of the enemy, in disgraceful flight, and routed on all points, rapidly disappear from the Portuguese territory, which they have infected with their presence. The governors of Portugal rejoice with you on this happy event; and after humbling themselves in the presence of the Almighty, the first and sovereign author of all good, they render due thanks to his royal highness the prince-regent our lord, whose wisdom established the bases of our defence; to his British majesty, to his enlightened ministry, and to the whole British nation, in whom we have found powerful and liberal allies, the most constant co-operation in repelling the common enemy, and that honor, probity, and steadiness of principle which particularly characterise that great nation; to the illustrious Wellington; whose sagacity and consummate military knowledge enabled him to penetrate the plans of the enemy, to take the most effectual precautions for frustrating them, and compelled them at last to fly with the remains of their numerous army, diminished by famine, by the most severe privations, and by the incessant pursuit of the allied forces; to the zealous and indefatigable Beresford, the restorer of discipline and organization to the Portuguese troops; to the brave and skilful generals and officers of both nations; to their brave comrades in arms, who, with generous emulation, never fought that they did not triumph; and, in fine, to the whole Portuguese people, whose loyalty, patriotism, constancy, and humanity, have been so gloriously distinguished amidst the tribulations which have afflicted us.

"A nation possessed of such qualities can never be subdued; and the calamities of war, instead of disheartening, serve only to augment its enthusiasm, and to make it feel all the horror of the slavery with which it was threatened.

"But, Portuguese, the lamentable effects of the invasion of those barbarians; the yet smoking remains of the humble cottage of the poor, of the palace of the man of opulence, of the cell of the religious, of the hospital which afforded shelter and relief to the poor and infirm, of the temples dedicated to the worship of the Most High; the innocent blood of so many peaceful citizens of both sexes, and of all ages, with which those heaps of ruins are still tinged; the insults of every kind heaped upon those whom the Vandals did not deprive of life—insults many times more cruel than death itself; the universal devastation of the fields, of plantations, of cattle, and of the instruments of agriculture; the robbery and destruction of every thing that the unhappy inhabitants of the invaded districts possessed;—this atrocious scene, which makes humanity shudder, affords a terrible lesson, which you ought deeply to engrave on your memory, in order fully to know that degenerate nation, who retain only the figure of men, and who in every respect are worse than wild beasts, and more blood-thirsty than tigers or lions. Wretched are they who trust in their deceitful promises! Victims of a foolish credulity, a thousand times will they repent, but without avail, of the levity with which they have trusted to the promises of a nation without faith and without law; of men who acknowledge neither the rights of humanity, nor respect the sacred tie of an oath. Opposed to such an enemy, the only alternatives which remained to us were resistance or retreat; the former depended on a competent armed force, the latter is a law which the duty of preserving life and property imposes on all peaceful citizens. These evacuating the towns where they dwell, transporting the effects which they can carry off, destroying those which they are obliged to abandon, and which might serve for the subsistence of the enemy, escape the horrors of the most infamous slavery, throw themselves into the arms of their fellow-countrymen, who receive them as brothers, assist the military operations, depriving the invaders of the means of maintaining themselves in the territory which they occupied; and in this way they are so far useful to themselves, because the enemy, not being able to support himself for a long time in positions where he is in want of subsistence, will soon be obliged to evacuate them; and the inhabitants returning immediately to their homes, neither suffer the inconveniences of a lengthened absence, nor find their houses and fields in that state of total devastation, in which the enemy's army would have left them, had he remained for a longer period.

"Such, Portuguese, are the lessons of experience which we ought never to forget.

"But amidst such great disasters, Providence is pleased to give us sources of consolation which will make them less sensibly felt.

"The unfortunate people who fled from the fury of their cruel oppressors have experienced the greatest kindness in the humanity of their fellow-citizens. In all the districts to which they have fled they were received with open arms; the inhabitants eagerly pressed to afford them all that succour which they could individually bestow; they filled their houses with emigrants; and many times have we perceived, with tears of joy, the generous emulation of those who disputed with one another who should afford the rights of hospitality to those unknown families who arrived in this capital without shelter or the means of subsistence.

"It is the duty of the government to take immediate measures for the relief of these necessitous persons; but the want of public funds, which are not even sufficient to provide for our defence, must make these measures less effectual, unless individuals liberally concur in a proceeding as much recommended by humanity as by patriotism.

"Under the inspection of an illustrious tribunal, which has advanced part of these succours, by the wise and economical measures of a member of that tribunal, executed by zealous and intelligent officers, the wretched fugitives have been fed, and numberless unfortunate persons have been rescued from the jaws of death. This great expence has been supported, not only by the resources which were at the disposal of government, but, still more by voluntary donations presented by natives and foreigners; among whom we ought to mention with particular distinction the subjects of his Britannic majesty, both those who are employed in the army, those who are attached to the legation, and those who are comprehended in the class of merchants. Those acts of patriotism and of Christian charity were not confined to the capital and its vicinity. In all the districts of the kingdom, whither the fugitives resorted, they met the same reception, and experienced the same kindness and liberal aid, as far as the ability of the inhabitants enabled them to extend it.

"The governors of the kingdom, in the name of the prince-regent, return thanks to all for such distinguished services, by which the lives of so many of his subjects have been saved, and those calamities softened which were caused by the scourge of a destructive war. His royal highness will rejoice in being the sovereign of a people so loyal, patriotic, generous, and Christian.

"It now only remains, to complete the work, to promote the restoration of the fugitives to their homes, to render habitable the towns which the barbarism of these spoilers has left covered with filth and unburied carcases; to relieve with medicine and food the sick who are perishing for want of such assistance, to give life to agriculture, by supplying the husbandman with seed-corn, as well as a little bread for his consumption for some time, and facilitating his means of purchasing cattle, and acquiring the instruments of agriculture.

"Such have been and are the constant cares of the governors of the kingdom.

"Portuguese! tribulations are the crucible in which the merit of men is purified. You have passed through this ordeal, and the result has been glorious. You are become a great nation,—a nation worthy of those heroic progenitors who illustrated the cradle of the monarchy. Preserve unalterable these sentiments; confide in your government, as your government confides in you; draw every day more closely the bonds of union among yourselves, with other nations and with our generous allies, who are our true brothers. Let one soul, one will, direct our common efforts; and if any one attempt to sow discord, let us tear from our bosom the venomous viper, and let us seal with his blood the ratification of our indissoluble alliance.

"Practise these maxims with the same constancy with which you have hitherto followed them, and you will be invincible.

"The Bishop Cardinal elect, P. SOUZA.

"CHARLES STUART. Marquis MONTEIRO MOR.

"Conde de REDONDO.

"RIC. RAIMUNDO NOGUEIRA.

"Palace of the Government, March 30, 1811."

An important change in the policy of the northern powers, with respect to the "continental system," seemed at this time probable. Denmark was the first to shew a disposition to relax the rigour of that system. In an arrangement between her and Sweden, she admitted conditions which were ostensibly, as well as virtually, in opposition to the principles imposed by France upon the continental powers. As far as depended upon Denmark, the commercial intercourse between Sweden and England was scarcely liable to interruption; for there was hardly a case of a Swedish vessel sailing either to or from England which would not fall within some of the provisions of the following decree, emitted by the court of Copenhagen:—

1. All Swedish vessels, detained on account of the bill of sale not being on-board, shall be released without further process.

2. Every Swedish vessel, detained merely because her destination was an English port, but which is furnished with documents from the Swedish government, as well as Swedish vessels now returning from England, laden with salt, or which are returning in ballast, shall neither be detained nor condemned.

3. Swedish vessels, which sailed for England before the declaration of war was known at the Swedish port from whence the vessel was dispatched, cannot be detained, much less condemned.

4. A Swedish vessel cannot be condemned merely for having used an English licence.

5. Swedish vessels suspected of having availed themselves of English convoys, cannot be condemned without proofs the most incontestible.

An attack upon the island of Anholt, then in possession of the enemy, was intended to have been put in execution in the fall of 1810; but as the enemy's ships of war kept on their station until the frost and ice set in, this plan was given up, being found to be impracticable. But in the commencement of the spring of 1811, the attack was again resolved to be made; however, the gun-boats, which were intended to be used in the expedition, were at that time in winter-quarters in the lakes, which were a long time filled with ice, and which prevented the vessels being put into action before the beginning of the month of March.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. X.

1811.

The order for attack was given, and on the 23d the flotilla and the transports were assembled in Gierillo bay. The island was reconnoitred, and it was found that there was only one schooner lying on the station. The light-house was fortified, but no other part of the island. It was in consequence determined that the troops should be disembarked by night; and on the morning marched against the light-house fort, and storm it, whilst in the mean time the gun-boats were to fire upon it from the rear, a formal siege being found to be impracticable. On the 26th, twelve gun-boats and twelve transport-vessels sailed from Gierillo bay, having on-board the troops destined for the expedition. On the 27th, at four o'clock in the morning, the troops were disembarked in the greatest order. The first lieutenant, Carl Holsten, in the naval service, marched immediately with 200 seamen along the shore, but unfortunately he was discovered by a patrol of cavalry. The enemy now fled into the fort, and it was not possible to cut him off. The intrepid naval Lieutenant Holsten followed them, and stormed the fort, but was beaten off. Major Melstedt then put himself at the head of the 650 men under his command, and being joined by 150 men under Captain Reydz, and the seamen under Lieutenant Holsten, undertook a general storm, but were again forced to retire. In the meanwhile, the flotilla were laid round the fort, and commenced a firing on it, whilst all the troops were preparing to make a fresh attack. The loss which had been sustained by these brave warriors only tended to increase their ardour. Whilst the gun-boats kept up a brisk fire on the flank of the fort, Major Melstedt on the one side, and Lieutenant Holsten on the other, commenced the attack. The out-works were already gained, and the troops were preparing to get over the high walls, when cartridge-shot was poured down on them from more than forty pieces of cannon. Major Von Melstedt ended his honorable career at the head of his troops; Captain Von Reydz then immediately took the command, and infused new life into the brave troops, who with the greatest steadiness stood the dreadful fire, and in conjunction with the valiant Lieutenant Holsten again renewed the attack.

A cannon-ball carried away both Captain V. Vrydz's legs, and another put an end to the life of Lieutenant Holsten, whilst leading his brave seamen to the combat. The men who had still to pass the inner and very deep ditch, were obliged to give way for the cartridge-balls; but their retreat was nevertheless conducted with the utmost order. An English flying battery pursued the fugitives, and the retreat was performed under a continual fire from the enemy. In the mean time, and very unexpectedly, a frigate was seen to the northward, which stood round to the east of the island, a brig steered to the west part, and a schooner came from the southward. It came on to blow hard, and the gun-boats could no longer keep their station. Endeavours were then made to re-embark as many as possible of the troops, and to save such as had escaped from the enemy. The transport-vessels had something the appearance of gun-boats, and they were therefore caused to steer towards the Trefoid, in order thereby to decoy the frigate to follow them, and save the gun-boats and the troops embarked on-board of them; the wind increased, and the gale became so violent, that the gun-boats could scarcely be kept afloat. To enter into an engagement with the enemy was not to be thought of, and it would have been an useless waste of time to have endeavoured to collect the boats together. It was therefore deemed most expedient to let the flotilla disperse itself. Signal was immediately made for the boats to reach the nearest shore, and the flotilla accordingly dispersed itself agreeably to orders given. This movement could not be perceived by the frigate, which was lying to the eastward of the island, on account of the reef which ran out from it. Eight of the gun-boats that were nearest together made the best of their way for Jutland, whilst the other four, with the utmost bravery, engaged the brig and schooner. They detained the enemy in his progress, and brought him several points out of his course.

Although this expedition was unsuccessful, yet the enemy did not obtain an easy victory. Even during the retreat, the schooner sustained so much damage, that she was obliged to put in under the island, and stay to obtain assistance. Besides the three commanders, several other Danish officers fell in the field of honor.

Among the affairs of Great Britain, we must first notice the death of the Spanish ambassador, Duke De Albuquerque, at Paddington, February 18; his disorder was derangement of the most violent kind. He was seized with it on the 8th, and never had a lucid interval from that day. His usual residence was at the Clarendon hotel; and on the first appearance of the disorder, he beat his own servants severely. This naturally excited astonishment, for his temper was usually calm and mild, and he had ever been one of the kindest and most indulgent masters. He then burst forth into a strain of invective against Bonaparte, so loud that he might be heard in the street; Moriar Napoleon was his constant cry, from the moment of his attack almost to that of his death. Medical aid was called in, and he was removed to Paddington, where his paroxysms were so violent, that it was with difficulty he could be kept in bed. On the night of the 17th, after a restless day, during which he had scarcely ever ceased to cry out Moriar Napoleon, he dropt into a short sleep, and a message was dispatched to Admiral Apodaca, with the intelligence. It was thought his disorder would assume a quieter aspect; vain hope! at half-past eleven he awoke in a violent paroxysm, and almost immediately expired. On the 2d of March, his remains were removed from the Spanish chapel, Spanish-place, Manchester-square, and interred at King Henry the Seventh's chapel, Westminster Abbey.

The re-appointment of his royal highness the Duke of York to the command of the British army engaged much of the public attention in the month of June; his royal highness had, in 1809, resigned the important office of commander-in-chief, in consequence of an investigation which had taken place into his conduct, on the testimony of a discarded mistress (Mrs. Clarke); Lord Milton having made a motion in the house of commons, (June 6), relative to this re-appointment, the chancellor of the exchequer candidly stated the circumstances which had immediately preceded the appointment of his royal highness to the command of the army; and when the house was in possession of them, he said they would be better enabled to judge of its propriety. "The house must be aware, that the gallant officer who held the command of the army since the resignation of the Duke of York, was an officer not only of long and eminent service, but of advanced age. He had been for half a century in some active situation in the service of his country. On his being attacked with illness in the beginning of the year, he had made a representation to his royal highness the prince-regent, that neither with safety to himself, nor justice to the duties of his office, could he continue to hold it. To this representation, made most earnestly, and repeated more than once, it was impossible not to attend. The place, then, thus becoming vacant, the next question which arose was as to the propriety of the person to be chosen to fill it. From the situation of our army, and our extended scale of operations on the Peninsula, it was quite impossible that such an office could be suffered to remain long vacant. Who, then, ought to be chosen as the successor to Sir David Dundas, was the question? From every view which he could take of affairs, he was inclined on every account to fix his choice on his royal highness the Duke of York. Whatever might occur to others, still when he considered his long and tried services—the advantage of which he had been to the army, and when he also considered who were likely to become his competitors, he must say, without any disparagement to those gentlemen, who under other circumstances would be very eligible, that he preferred the appointment of his royal highness the Duke of York. There was no difference of opinion on this subject; and he certainly could not hesitate, when he considered that his royal highness was particularly qualified, which appeared from his arrangements, all of which were calculated to be of benefit to the service, of advantage to the officer, and of comfort to the soldier; arrangements, too, several of which seemed to be made to prevent many of those practices which it was the object of the enquiry to detect. Under these circumstances, he thought they would disgrace themselves, if, from an apprehension of any motion which either the noble lord or any one else could bring before parliament, they withheld from the public the advantages to be derived from the services of his royal highness. There was not either the least reason to suppose that his restoration would be received with any indisposition on the part of the army. He did not mean to infer that their mere choice ought to direct any appointment; though certainly, if ever there was a time when the feeling of the army ought to be made the ground of action, it was the present: but when their feeling was founded on the eminent services of the individual who had excited it, then that feeling and the ground of the appointment were the same. Unless, then, there was something in the manner in which the house had, on a former occasion, expressed itself, there could be no doubt of the propriety of this appointment. According to the statement of the noble lord, (Lord Milton) one would suppose that he thought the resolution of the house militated against the Duke of York's return to office not only now, but for ever. If not for ever, and yet that the appointment was to be conceived improper now, at what period could any one say the prohibition was to expire? What, however, was the state of the case at the conclusion of the enquiry? The first resolution went to acquit his royal highness of any personal corruption or connivance. It was a full, fair, free, and complete acquittal. After his acquittal, then, certain circumstances operated on the mind of his royal highness, which induced him to tender his resignation. The noble lord had said, however, that it was the opinion of the house that he should retire. This was never expressed, and therefore it was impossible for the noble lord to have any means of knowing it. That there were some in the house who were of this opinion, he was very willing to admit; but still there were

BOOK IX.

CHAP. X.

1811.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. X.

1811.

others who thought so very differently, that they even were of opinion the house ought to come to some future resolution, expressing their opinion that the enquiry should not be followed by any such resignation. When his right honorable friend (Mr. Bathurst) proposed his resolution in 1809, he expressly declared, that he had taken care so to frame it as to preclude the suspicion that he recommended any such result. Thus, then, as far as the mover's own declaration, and the implied opinion of those who supported him, went, they by no means acted on such a sentiment. True it certainly was that a feeling had been excited in the country, to which his royal highness might have thought it better to submit than expose his father's government to embarrassment. He should not pursue what had been detailed at the time, or what had been detailed since; but he could not avoid asking the house, whether if previous to the termination of the enquiry they had been aware of the nature of the conspiracy which was on foot—aware by what means the evidence had been obtained, and what arts had been employed to represent that as an independent and patriotic enquiry—he would not ask, after all that, whether their decision would have been different; but he would ask, whether they thought all that feeling would have been excited in the country? What, then, he would ask the house, was to be inferred from the resolution? What but a complete acquittal? The next step was a declaration that it was not necessary to go farther. In the amendment the word “now” was particularly emphatic. The amendment said it was not “now” necessary to go farther. It did not mean that because the Duke of York had resigned, they would not then go farther; but that on his re-appointment, or at any future time, it would be at their discretion, to enter into farther investigation. The case left off with a full acquittal on the part of the Duke of York of all guilt. As to the nature, manner, or propriety of any future proceedings after the vote of acquittal, of course there were different opinions. He, taking a large share in those debates, had certainly told the house, that in his opinion they ought to proceed farther. Whether his proposition, or the proposition of his right honorable friend opposite, as one of a stronger description, would have been adopted, was still to be discussed; but all discussion on the subject had been put a stop to by the resignation of his royal highness. But the noble lord had now stated that there ought to be a recorded censure upon ministers, for advising an appointment in the face of a resolution of the house. If this was the case—if the house really meant by their resolution to imply an impossibility of the Duke of York's return to office, he must say a resolution more unfairly stated by its mover, or adopted by the house, he never saw; the mover directly declaring he did not mean to imply any such thing, and the house fully acquiescing in that explanation so given. He never had the slightest idea, in his own mind, that the resolution operated, or was ever intended to operate, as the least bar or obstacle to the re-appointment of his royal highness. The house, however, might take a view of all the previous circumstances, and then he left it to them to judge whether they thought the prerogative had been so ill exercised in this instance as to call for their interference. The advice which had been given, had been given under a full consideration of all the circumstances; and on these circumstances he relied for his justification. The advice had been called for by the long tried and eminent services of the illustrious personage in question, who had fully proved himself most capable of filling the situation. In recommending his appointment, he really thought that he was recommending the appointment of the fittest man in the country for the office; and he now left its consideration to the house, with the observation, that they could not censure it without charging and contradicting the construction of their own resolution.”

The motion having been negatived by a majority of 249, the re-appointment of his royal highness was peremptorily maintained; and having been restored to his important situation, justice must add, that he carefully discharged the duties of it with credit to himself, and with utility to his country.

CHAPTER XI.

Continuation of the Campaign.—Reverses of Fortune.—Siege of Badajoz abandoned by Lord Wellington.—Desperate Attack on Tarragona.—Capture of Olivo.—Fall of Tarragona.—Surrender of Figueras.—Review of Lord Wellington's Conduct.—The English, after a desperate Battle, raise the Siege of Ciudad Rodrigo.—Battle of Fuente Guinaldo.—General Hill's Defeat of the French at Arroy de Molino.—Surrender of the University of Cervera.—Attack of the Castle of Belpuig.—Conquest of Saguntum by the French.—Merida surprised and taken by General Hill.

THE Duke of Ragusa, commander-in-chief of the French army of Portugal, was in motion the beginning of June, for the purpose of driving beyond the Coa that part of the English army which Lord Wellington (when he set out for the siege of Badajoz) had left upon the frontiers before Ciudad Rodrigo.

On the 5th of June the Duke of Ragusa arrived at Ciudad Rodrigo, with his advanced-guard, and a body of two thousand horse; the English divisions forced their retreat into the mountains of Sabugal and Alfayates to get to the Tagus.

Lord Wellington drew back successively his troops round Badajoz; but feeling himself pressed, he resolved to try a grand effort to carry the place before the two armies united. After a dreadful fire of artillery, a first assault was made; but the breach was defended by Frenchmen, 600 English remained on the place. A second assault had the same result—so that the English lost more than 1,200 men in these fruitless attacks. Lord Wellington was about to make a desperate effort, when, on the 16th, the Duke of Ragusa arrived at Merida, and joined the Duke of Dalmatia. The two armies marched upon Badajoz, the siege of which Wellington raised precipitately, re-entering Portugal with all his troops. His lordship candidly confessed, "that he was unfortunately mistaken in his estimate of the quality of the means necessary to take the place."

The defence of Tarragona became more obstinate in proportion as the attack advanced. On the 21st, a howitzer blew up the powder magazine of the enemy's breaching battery, but in an hour it was repaired. Three practicable breaches having been opened at four in the morning, Suchet ordered the assault, and at seven all was ready; 1,590 grenadiers were united with scapers and scaling-ladders, and disposed in columns of attack and reserve. They were followed by 1,000 workmen. At seven at night, at the signal of four bombs at once, five columns darted against the points marked out, crying, Vive L'Empereur. Five thousand men defended the works attacked and the lower town. They opposed at first a strong resistance and a very warm fire; but the irresistible impetuosity of the grenadiers overthrew all obstacles in a few minutes. Colonel Bouvier with his column scaled the breach of the bastion of the Chanoines, and pursued the Spaniards to the extremity of the bastion; they tried to stop the French at the passage of the draw-bridge, a dreadful carnage was made, and the ditches were filled with dead bodies. The curtain was next scaled, and the enemy reached the breach of Fort Royal, where ladders were applied.

By the capture of the lower town and its dependencies, eighty pieces of cannon fell into the enemy's hands. Their loss, however, was very severe. In his dispatch on this occasion, Suchet made use of the following remarkable expressions: "I fear much, if the garrison wait for the assault in their last hold, I shall be forced to set a terrible example, and intimidate for ever Catalonia and Spain, by the destruction of a whole city."

In the night of the 29th of May, between ten and eleven o'clock, was lost, in a few minutes, the fort of Olivo, and that which ought not to have been effected without the sacrifice of at least 4,000 of the enemy, was, by their craft and intrigue, performed with less than the loss of 200. The capture of the place appeared to have been the consequence of changing its garrison (the regiment of Iuberia), for that of Almeria, at nine at night. The enemy having obtained information of this disposition, of the word that had been given, &c. presented themselves at the moment it was to have been carried into effect. A part of the new garrison having entered, the enemy entered with them, giving the word, Almeria, to the centinels as they passed. When within, they began the attack with the bayonet, at the same time aiding their companions without to mount the walls. In the confusion, while one could not be known from another, they killed a great number, and took prisoners eight hundred soldiers, and sixteen officers, according to the dispatch which Suchet sent, to request that the officers might have their baggage sent to them for their journey through Aragon into France. Olivo being taken, all the 1811.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. XI.

BOOK IX. fire of the place was directed against it till it was reduced to a heap of ruins. The French, however, did not abandon it, though great numbers of them had been killed.

CHAP. XI.

1811.

Tarragona was taken by storm about half-past six in the evening of June 28. Although the French were then within pistol-shot of the wall, it did not appear likely the place would have fallen so soon, from the intrepidity of the Spanish soldiers, who shewed the greatest indifference to the shot which were constantly whizzing past them, and precautions had been taken by fortifying a range of buildings which ran in a parallel with the wall, by blocking up the streets leading from it with wine-pipes filled with earth, and cutting a deep and extensive ditch on the side facing the enemy, which formed a barrier as strong as the wall, and would have required new works to have reached it. Such was the state of wretched Tarragona on Friday the 28th of June. At half-past six in the morning, the French opened by degrees a very heavy fire of great guns and musketry, the Spaniards returning it with equal vigour. It had been concerted this morning by the Spanish General, Campo Verde, who was at Cambrils with 10,000 men, that he should attack the French early next morning, on one side; Colonel Skerrit, who commanded about 1,200 British, on another part, while the garrison made a sortie; but the governor's conduct was so wavering, that a short time after this agreement, he sent off to know if the British squadron could embark the garrison. Captain Codrington, of the navy, pointed out the impropriety of doing so after the above arrangements for an attack, and advised him to hold out. He sent off word again to say, that he would defend the place to the last extremity; that the enemy had made a small breach, but it was of no consequence. About six o'clock in the evening, from treachery, or heinous neglect on the part of the principal officers, the troops stationed to protect the walls were left destitute of ammunition. The French, always vigilant, took immediate advantage of this neglect, marched coolly up to the very gate, forced it open with hatchets and bars, and entered the town. The Spaniards on the wall made resistance for some time with the bayonet, but were obliged to give way to musketry and bayonet combined. A sanguinary tumult ensued—women, children, and defeated soldiers, by their cries of "the French are in the town," spread the panic to those soldiers who were able to resist, and the flight became general towards the gate opposite to that by which the French entered; but it was too small for the multitude to escape in time from the diabolical fury of the French, who had already begun a savage massacre. Several precipitated themselves from the wall, and were killed. About 4,000 got out, and rushed furiously through a body of French infantry, who were waiting for them outside, and continued their flight on the road leading towards Barcelona. They had already got out of range of the French musketry, congratulating themselves on their escape, when a destructive fire assailed them from several field-pieces, which the French, expecting the event, and determining that none should escape, had taken the usual precaution to place behind a deep ditch which they had cut across the road. The miserable Spaniards, now almost stupified with terror, attempted the heights, but the French, equally prepared at all points, coolly put them to death, although defenceless and unresisting. Those that remained, in despair threw themselves into the sea, where the English boats made every effort to save them, and succeeded in picking up 500, the mangled remains of 8,000 men, women, and children; for these Vandals spared neither sex nor age. Those that remained in the town met with a miserable fate. The French, on entering, set it on fire in several places, and, shocking to relate, an hospital, containing 3,000 wounded Spaniards, was burnt!

The fall of Tarragona, which the French took possession of, occasioned great discomfiture in the minds of the Spaniards; fears were entertained for other important places; and these were in some measure realized by the surrender of Figueras, at discretion, on the 19th of August. The garrison consisted of 3,500 men, and nearly 350 officers. The blockade of Figueras lasted four months, during which time 2,000 men perished within the walls.

That the reader may better comprehend the present designs of the commander-in-chief, we shall here take a brief review of his late operations.

When Lord Wellington expelled the French from Portugal, (such was the expression at the time,) in the month of March, two very powerful fortresses were in the hands of the enemy. Almeida and Badajoz commanded the two high roads from Spain into Portugal; and the enemy which possessed either or both of these fortresses, possessed not only a facility but even a perfect security in any future advanced movement. Lord Wellington, therefore, had no sooner cleared the open country of the enemy, and repelled them into Spain, than he immediately adopted the resolution of besieging these posts. Almeida having been exhausted by the supplies which it had afforded to the French army, was nearly in a state of famine, and Lord Wellington very naturally calculated that it would fall by the mere effect of a blockade. He accordingly took up a position of great ability, so that he at once blockaded Almeida and put himself in a condition in which the enemy could not attack him without having the advantage greatly against them. Almeida, however, in the opinion of the enemy's generals, was of too great importance to be abandoned without an effort. This effort was accordingly made in the battle of Fuente Donora, and totally failed. The result was, the fall of Almeida, and the fugitive escape of her garrison, as mentioned in chapter 8.

It cannot be doubted, therefore, that Lord Wellington accomplished upon this point an affair of great importance. If Almeida were of no value would the French have hazarded a battle to preserve it? And was not its fall, immediately subsequent to this battle, an indisputable proof that the victory was really with the English general?

The fortress of next importance was Badajoz, which commanded the great western road into Spain, in the same manner as Almeida commanded the north-eastern. Lord Wellington, therefore, in the course of his pursuit of Massena, detached Marshal Beresford to clear the enemy from Alentejo, and to prepare the way for the siege of Badajoz. The marshal was successful in his first efforts, but the siege of Badajoz, defended by a good officer and a brave garrison, was beyond his strength. He therefore passed the fortress, and entered Estremadura, in the plains of which he continued to support himself and to refresh his cavalry.

Lord Wellington proceeded in person to undertake this important service himself. He sat down before Badajoz, and in his dispatches home, most certainly authorized the ministers and the public to expect the speedy reduction of that fort. In this, however, his lordship was disappointed. But let it not be imputed to him as any culpable want of judgment, that he did not foresee what the courage of the garrison, and the desperation of the French, might possibly effect. Nothing could be more reasonable than the expectation that Badajoz could not hold out. The works were in ruins, and within a few days more the most heroic courage would have been unavailing.

Marshal Soult, who commanded the army in Andalusia and Estremadura, availed himself of this short interval; collected all his forces, and reached Albuera. The battle of Albuera was bloody and desperate, and though the advantage of the mere battle was on the side of the English, the consequent event effected the French purpose. The Anglo-Portuguese army was too much crippled to remain on the plains. It became necessary, therefore, to abandon the siege of Badajoz, and to cover the passes of Alentejo and the roads to the banks of the Tagus.—Lord Wellington accordingly took up a position for this purpose, and the French, having saved Badajoz, and accomplished the design of their advanced movement, returned into Andalusia, and dispersed themselves in search of food and forage.

The French having received their reinforcements, were again enabled to advance, and as there was only one road by which they could indulge any expectation of entering Portugal, Lord Wellington hastened to possess himself of it. He accordingly quitted the strong mountains of the Arranches, and his position at Portalegre, and hastened to the Coa and the Agueda, between which is the high road from Salamanca and Ciudad Rodrigo into Portugal, by Guarda and Almeida. When he reached this position, there was every appearance that Ciudad Rodrigo had a weak garrison, and was in a more distressed condition than the event proved. Lord Wellington, therefore, converted his position into a blockade of this fortress, and a general expectation was entertained that he might possess himself of it.

Ciudad Rodrigo had been for some time blockaded by the English under Lord Wellington, and a considerable body of Portuguese and Spanish auxiliaries; the French were said (as before intimated) to have totally evacuated Portugal, but they suddenly returned with a view to relieve that important fortress; in consequence of which a desperate battle was fought, in which the French were completely successful, and the English raised the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, towards the close of September. By Lord Wellington's dispatches it appeared, that "the Portuguese artillerymen attached to the guns, which were for a moment in the enemy's possession, were cut down at their guns." Again, "The enemy having collected, for the object of relieving Ciudad Rodrigo, the army of the north, which were withdrawn from the attack which they commenced on General Abadia in Galicia, in which are included twenty-two battalions of the imperial-guard, and General Souham's division of infantry, composed of troops recently arrived in Spain from the army of Naples, and now drawn from the frontiers of Navarre, where they had been employed in operations against Mina, together with five divisions, and all the cavalry of the army called of Portugal, composing an army of not less than 60,000 men, of which 6,000 were cavalry, and 125 pieces of artillery; I could not maintain the blockade of Ciudad Rodrigo, nor could any efforts which I could make, prevent, or materially impede, the collection of the supplies, or the march of the convoy for the relief of that place. I did all that I could expect to effect, without incurring the risk of great loss for no object; and as the reports, as usual, were so various, in regard to the enemy's real strength, it was necessary that I should see their army."

BOOK IX.
 CHAP. XI.
 1811.

A gallant action was however successfully fought by General Hill, who succeeded, on the 28th of October, in surprising General Girard's division, at or near Arroy de Molino, consisting of about 7,000 men, where he took upwards of 1,500 prisoners, and killed about 240. Among the former, were General Bron, the Prince D'Arenberg, the chief of the staff, two colonels, and forty other officers. General Girard was badly wounded, and escaped to the mountains with about 300 infantry. The enemy lost their artillery and baggage. The English had only nine killed, and thirty wounded. General Hill marched to Merida, where he found no enemy, and destroyed the extensive magazines at that place.

October 11, the University of Cervera surrendered to Colonel Green, at this time employed on a particular service at Catalonia: 350 men composed its garrison, and a very considerable depôt of wheat was found. On the 12th, Colonel Green accompanied the Baron de Eroles to the attack of the castle of Belpuig, near Lerida, which being determined to defend itself, was ultimately reduced by mines, and one ten-pounder, the castle becoming a ruin before the surrender: upwards of 160 prisoners fell into the hands of the Spaniards.

About fifty miles to the north of Ciudad Rodrigo is the river Douro, flowing east and west, that is to say, across the country. From the south bank of this river issues the river Agueda, which runs southerly towards Ciudad Rodrigo. About twenty miles from its mouth in the Douro, the main stream of the Agueda divides itself into two branches, an easterly one towards Portugal, and a westerly one in Spain. The eastern branch is the river Azava. The westerly branch is the continuation of the Agueda. The plain, therefore, in which Ciudad Rodrigo is situated, is intersected by these two rivers. The Agueda runs down to the town, which is situated upon it, and the Azava flows parallel to it, and about eight miles distant, on the Portuguese frontier.

Lord Wellington took up his position in part between these two rivers, and partly on a ridge of hills on the Portuguese side of the Azava, and about seven miles from Ciudad Rodrigo, so as to have the latter river in his front; and in this position he awaited the attack of the enemy.

On the 24th of September, they encamped for the evening on heights above Ciudad Rodrigo. On the 25th, the enemy moved forwards. General Montbrun, at the head of fourteen squadrons, amongst which were the Lanciers de Berg, moved briskly to the Azava, and having passed that river, began the battle by attacking our army posted on the ridge. General Montbrun's division of cavalry consisted of two parts; the one under himself, the other under General

Wattier. General Wattier took the charge of the attack of the ridge, whilst Montbrun, going off to the left, took the road to Fuente Guinaldo, where was the English right. It was seen, at the same time, that the greatest part of the enemy's infantry were taking the same direction.

Lord Wellington, therefore, having thus discovered the object of their principal attack, immediately hastened reinforcements to his division in that quarter, and himself rode from one position to the other, to encourage them to do their duty; to receive the enemy in squares, and to fall back, when necessary, without disorder.

In the mean time, General Wattier had commenced the feint attack on the English left. Immediately, however, upon his crossing the Azava, he was charged by two squadrons of the 16th and 14th light dragoons, and, for the moment, was compelled to give way. General Wattier now put himself at the head of his men, and rallied them with much spirit. They made a second charge upon the English cavalry, but, as they were advancing, were unexpectedly saluted by a brisk discharge of musketry from a wood on their left flank. This well-timed fire was from the 61st regiment, which, with the most laudable promptitude, had been secretly sent, and posted there during the first attack. The effect was to the full what had been anticipated. The impetuosity of the enemy's charge, and the connection of their ranks, were broken; and Major-general Anson falling upon them at the same time, converted their confusion into a route. They hastily re-crossed the Azava, and were pursued for some distance by the English.

Whilst this was going on, the English left General Montbrun, with the greater part of the French cavalry, and with the French infantry following up immediately behind him, to attack the extreme part of the English right. The position of this right was on a ridge of heights, in front of Fuente Guinaldo, and crossing the road to that town. As Lord Wellington could not foresee the point of their attack, before they put themselves in march, this was the weakest part of the English line. The object of Montbrun was to force through it, and thus, by turning it, and getting into its rear, to shut in the English position between himself and the Azava. Montbrun succeeded so far as to reach the position before the reinforcements sent up by Lord Wellington. The small body of English troops, however, sustained the onset with most distinguished bravery. One regiment of French dragoons succeeded in taking two pieces of cannon, which had been posted on a rising ground, on the right of the English; but they were charged by the 2d battalion of the 5th regiment, under the command of Major Ridge, and the guns were immediately retaken. The 77th regiment, and three squadrons of Major-general Alten's brigade, distinguished themselves equally eminently. The enemy attacked the position in three columns; the 5th regiment, as we have said, repulsed their left column; the 77th their centre column, and the three squadrons of Major-general Alten their right column.

In the mean time, the great body of the enemy's infantry came up, and Lord Wellington seeing their superiority, and that the continuance of the contest in that quarter would lead to a general action, ordered their retreat on Fuente Guinaldo. This was accordingly done in the best possible order. The troops on the position were formed into several squares, and marched in this shape. The French cavalry in vain rushed upon them. The squares halted, and repelled them with the most distinguished steadiness. One of the squares in particular, composed of the 5th and 77th regiments, was charged on three of its sides at once; it halted on the instant, and fixing itself, as in the manner of a determined individual, in position, received and repulsed the enemy with the most heroic firmness. Not a man was scarcely moved from his rank and lines, except where his corpse filled up the space previously occupied by his living body. It is in these kinds of charges, man to man, that the great question of national superiority of mind and manhood is decided: and happily the decision has been invariably in favor of the English, and never more so than in the several sharp contests on the frontiers of Portugal.

This retreat was followed by the whole of the English line, which entered its temporary entrenchments at Fuente Guinaldo in the course of the same evening, and of the following morning. The French followed this movement so far as to present themselves in front of Fuente Guinaldo on the morning of the 26th; but as Lord Wellington declined a battle, from the several reasons already mentioned, they shortly withdrew again behind the Aguada; and, a few days afterwards, both Marmont (who succeeded Massena) and Lord Wellington resumed not only their former positions, but almost their former relations and views. Marmont posted himself at Placentia, and Lord Wellington took up the same line around Ciudad Rodrigo as before.

After the relief of Ciudad Rodrigo, Marshal Suchet advanced against General Blake, and completely defeated the Spanish army under his command. After twenty days labour and fatigue, Suchet succeeded in making a practicable breach in the walls of the castle of Saguntum; but during this period General Blake, with a view to save Saguntum from falling into the hands of the French, advanced to give Suchet battle, and compel him to raise the siege. This was on the 24th of October; a battle ensued, and the result was, that after seven hours' hard fighting, the Spaniards were entirely broken and put to flight, with the loss of 6,500 killed, wounded, and prisoners: (the latter amounted to 4,639, of whom 230 were officers,) forty colonels or lieutenant-colonels, two field-marsbals, sixteen pieces of artillery, eight caissons, 4,208 English muskets, and four stand of colours. The day after this battle, which was fought on the 25th of October, Suchet summoned the castle of Saguntum to surrender; and the lieutenant-colonel of artillery, who was sent with an answer to the summons, was conducted through the midst of the officers and prisoners, that he might have no doubt as to the issue of the battle which had taken place the day before. Saguntum accordingly surrendered, and the garrison, added to the men taken from the army under General Blake, made the total amount of prisoners 7,211, of whom upwards of 369 were officers.

53.

After the fall of Saguntum, the key to Valencia, General Blake threw himself into it with 17,000 men: Suchet, however, continued his approaches, and, on the 26th of December, made a furious attack upon the Spanish lines. After a slight resistance, these were broken, and the whole army put to the rout. Blake, with about 5,000 men effected his escape into the city, whilst Mahi and the other Spanish generals retreated to Allayada.

At the close of this year, General Hill surprised and took Merida with very little loss. The following was his letter, on this occasion, to Lord Wellington:

"Merida, Dec. 30, 1811.

"My Lord—In pursuance to your lordship's instructions, I put the troops under my orders in march from their several cantonments, and entered this province on the 27th inst. by Albuquerque, Villa de Rey, and St. Vicente; and by the intelligence which I received from various quarters, I was led to entertain the most sanguine hopes that I should have been able to surprise the enemy's troops stationed in this town. I was, however, disappointed in my expectations, by finding in La Nava, on our approach to that village yesterday, with the column from Albuquerque, a party of the enemy, consisting of about 300 voltigeurs and a few hussars, being part of a detachment which had arrived there the night preceding, apparently on a plundering excursion, the remainder whereof has proceeded to Cordivallas, another village about two leagues distant. A patrolle from La Nava fell in with the head of our column, and gave the alarm to the detachment, which immediately commenced its retreat towards Merida, followed by the cavalry of my advanced-guard, consisting of between 3 and 400 of the 13th light dragoons and 2d hussars. As I considered the intercepting of the entire of this party to be of the greatest importance to our ulterior operations, I directed the cavalry above-mentioned to make every effort to effect it, or, at least, to check its march until the arrival of some infantry.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. XI.

1811.

"The intrepid and admirable manner, however, in which the enemy retired, his infantry formed in square, and favored as he was by the nature of the country, of which he knew how to take the fullest advantage, prevented the cavalry alone from effecting any thing against him; and after following him for upwards of a league, and making an ineffectual attempt to break him, I judged it advisable to give over the pursuit, and he effected his retreat, with the loss of about twenty killed, and as many wounded, from four nine-pounders, which, by the great exertions of Major Hawker, and his officers and men, got within range, and followed him for some distance, but were unable to close upon him, owing to the deepness of the country.

"One wing of the 71st light infantry, under Lieutenant-colonel the Hon. H. Cadogan, also exerted themselves in a most laudable manner to overtake the enemy, but were at too great a distance to admit of their accomplishing it in any reasonable time.

"The arrival of the above-mentioned party at Merida, made the enemy acquainted with our approach, of which I have reason to think he was before entirely ignorant; and he, in consequence, evacuated the town during the night, leaving unfinished some works which he was constructing for its defence, and we entered it in the course of the day. I regret to state that we had two men killed, and some wounded in the affair.

"I have, &c.

(Signed) "R. HILL."

"Since writing the above, it has been reported to me, that 180 fanegas of wheat have been found in the depôt of this town, belonging to the French, besides a quantity of bread.

"Lord Viscount Wellington, &c."

CHAPTER XII.

Brief Review of the War in Portugal and Spain during 1811.—The Colonial Warfare and Foreign Relations.—The Prince Regent's Speech on the opening of Parliament in 1812.—Continuation of Hostilities.—Valencia taken by Suchet.—Tupper's Address to the Valencians.—Ciudad Rodrigo captured by Lord Wellington.—The Fortress of Peniscola surrendered to the French.—Badajoz taken by Storm, by Lord Wellington.—Sir Rowland Hill's Victory at Almaraz.—Major-general Slade's Action.—Lord Wellington enters Salamanca.—Capture of Madrid by the Allies.—Lord Wellington abandons Madrid, and retreats to Portugal.—Dismissal of Ballasteros from the Spanish Service.

THE conduct of the war in Portugal, during 1811, was such as reflected equal credit both on the country and on the army and commanders. On the commencement of this year, Lord Wellington was in front of Santarem, to which place Massena had retreated when he found it impossible to break through his lordship's admirable lines at Torres Vedras. This event of Massena's march disappointed every expectation in Europe but that of Lord Wellington. His lordship foresaw, from the very commencement, that he should be able to make an effectual stand on the high ground about Lisbon. The whole conduct of the war, therefore, as far as respected his lordship, was that of a complete drama, in which the skilful poet, act by act, and scene by scene, conducts his fable to the destined catastrophe, and converts every seeming impediment into the means of furthering his plot and action.

The fortune of the war, however, did not end in this mere defence. Massena remained at Santarem only till he had consumed all the food and forage which the adjacent country could supply. In the same moment, in which he had thus devoured the country, he learned that the expected reinforcements to Lord Wellington were about to arrive, and that Sir Joseph Yorke was already upon the coast of Portugal. This information, and the urgency of his necessity, compelled him to retreat before the English at Cartaxo, as he had already retreated before them at Torres Vedras. Lord Wellington followed him in the pursuit with all the skill and success which had been anticipated from his known abilities. The retreat of Massena was covered by one of the ablest of the French generals. A triumph over an army conducted by Massena, and covered by Marshal Ney, augmented the reputation of Lord Wellington, and the brave army under him. Massena not having sufficiently proved, what however was well known to Europe, the prowess of the English army, had importunately solicited the command in Portugal, as the means of adding to his reputation; he obtained it, and by the unexpected event of his retreat lost a considerable part of the name which he had previously obtained. He deemed it, therefore, well worth one desperate effort, to endeavour to recover some of his lost glory. Such was the occasion of the battle of Fuente Donora. The gaining of the victory in this battle therefore, was, on the part of the English, at once a confirmation of their former successes, and an accession of new military glory.

Whilst this was going forward on the north-east frontier of Portugal, another, and a greater achievement, by the British army, was on its progress in the south. Lord Wellington, whilst on the retreat, had detached Marshal Beresford towards Badajoz. The marshal did not succeed in taking that fortress; but with a spirit worthy of his name and country, he marched immediately into Spain, that he might meet the advancing enemy. Marshal Soult, upon his part, was hastening up from Seville on his apprehension of the fate of Badajoz, already closely pressed by the English and Portuguese. The two armies, thus seeking each other, shortly came into contact, and each fought with the spirit of their respective circumstances. The issue of the day at Albuera added another occasion of triumph to British generals. It was surely no inconsiderable praise to repel the best army, and the best marshal of France, with an army of Portuguese, raised and disciplined almost within the year.

Such was the course of glory and merit, which had been performed by the English army of Portugal during the year 1811; the result of which was, as far as respected the hopes of maintaining Portugal, and reinstating the Prince of the Brazils, more promising than at any former period.

With respect to the war in Spain, it necessarily followed the chances and fortunes of the war in Portugal. Every victory in Portugal was in fact a victory in Spain. Every thing which impaired the strength of the French armies, necessarily augmented and confirmed that of the allies in the same proportion. The aspect of the war in Spain, however, had other ground to stand upon besides that of the Portuguese successes. The Guerillas fought with a perseverance and patriotism which promised ultimately to save their country. Duran, Espoz y Minha, and the Empecinado, found employment for three of the best marshals of France. Two hundred thousand Frenchmen were calculated to have already perished in Spain, and yet the kingdom was as unconquered as ever.

It would be unpardonable, however, in this enumeration, not to make a distinct mention of the battle of Barrosa, in which the united skill and courage of General Graham, and the characteristic gallantry of his army, obtained a most complete victory against a vast numerical superiority of the enemy. The advantages of such victories were not in their immediate fruits. Their main value was in the effect which they had in animating and inspiring the allies, and in giving an auspicious air and commencement to the good fortune of a cause which much wanted it. The Spaniards were engaged in a contest in which they were too well acquainted with their inferiority to the disciplined troops of the enemy. It was worth half a dozen battles, therefore, to give them a proof that the enemy was less invincible than they had been led to imagine him. General Graham, in the battle of Barrosa, may be said to have laid the first stone of the Spanish independence.

The colonial warfare equally contributed to England's general prosperity, and to the augmentation of her national military honor. The capture of the Isle of France cleared the Indian seas of the pirates which infested her distant trade.

The conquest of Batavia completed the expulsion of the enemy from the surface of these seas. It procured for the English the last colony which his fortune had left him.

With respect to foreign relations, their general appearance was to the full as satisfactory as the circumstances of the war. Russia, indeed, was still hostile, but her hostility was of a kind which every Russian and Englishman must have wished it. Sweden, likewise, was not that ready ally of France, which the French emperor had anticipated. America, however, did not appear, at this period, inclined to be on good terms with Great Britain.

The imperial parliament of the united kingdom of Great Britain was opened with its usual formalities January 7, 1812. The speech of the prince being mere narrative, was as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen,—We are commanded by his royal highness the prince-regent, to express to you the deep sorrow which he feels in announcing to you the continuance of his majesty's lamented indisposition, and the unhappy disappointment of those hopes of his majesty's early recovery, which had been cherished by the dutiful affection of his family, and the loyal attachment of his people.

"The prince-regent has directed copies of the last reports of her majesty the queen's council to be laid before you, and he is satisfied that you will adopt such measures as the present melancholy exigency may appear to require.

"In securing a suitable and ample provision for the support of his majesty's royal dignity, and for the attendance upon his majesty's sacred person during his illness, the prince-regent rests assured, that you will also bear in mind the indispensable duty of continuing to preserve for his majesty the facility of resuming the personal exercise of his royal authority, in the happy event of his recovery, so earnestly desired by the wishes and the prayers of his family and his subjects.

"The prince-regent directs us to signify to you the satisfaction with which his royal highness has observed, that the measures which have been pursued for the defence and security of the kingdom of Portugal, have proved completely effectual; and that on the several occasions in which the British or Portuguese troops had been engaged with the enemy, the reputation already acquired by them has been fully maintained.

"The successful and brilliant enterprise which terminated in the surprise, in Spanish Estremadura, of a French corps by a detachment of the allied army under Lieutenant-general Hill, is highly creditable to that distinguished officer, and to the troops under his command, and has contributed materially to obstruct the designs of the enemy in that part of the peninsula.

"The prince-regent is assured, that while you reflect with pride and satisfaction on the conduct of his majesty's troops, and of the allies, in these various and important services, you will render justice to the consummate judgment and skill displayed by General Lord Viscount Wellington, in the direction of the campaign. In Spain the spirit of the people remains unsubdued; and the system of warfare so peculiarly adapted to the actual condition of the Spanish nation, has been recently extended and improved, under the advantages which result from the operations of the allied armies on the frontier, and from the countenance and assistance of his majesty's navy on the coast. Although the great exertions of the enemy have in some quarters been attended with success, his royal highness is persuaded, that you will admire the perseverance and gallantry manifested by the Spanish armies. Even in those provinces principally occupied by the French forces, new energy has arisen among the people; and the increase of difficulty and danger has produced more connected efforts of general resistance.

"The prince-regent, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, commands us to express his confident hope that you will enable him to continue to afford the most effectual aid and assistance in support of the contest, which the brave nations of the peninsula still maintain with such unabated zeal and resolution.

"His royal highness commands us to express his congratulations on the success of the British arms in the island of Java.

"The prince-regent trusts that you will concur with his royal highness in approving the wisdom and ability with which this enterprise, as well as the capture of the islands of Bourbon and Mauritius, has been conducted, under the immediate direction of the governor-general of India; and that you will applaud the decision, gallantry, and spirit conspicuously displayed in the late operations of the brave army under the command of that distinguished officer Lieutenant-general Sir Samuel Auchmuty, so powerfully and ably supported by his majesty's naval forces.

"By the completion of this system of operations, great additional security will have been given to the British commerce and possessions in the East Indies, and the colonial power of France will have been entirely extinguished.

"His royal highness thinks it expedient to recommend to your attention, the propriety of providing such measures for the future government of the British possessions in India, as shall appear from experience, and upon mature deliberation, to be calculated to secure their internal prosperity, and to derive from those flourishing dominions the utmost degree of advantage to the commerce and revenue of the united kingdom.

"We are commanded by the prince-regent to acquaint you, that while his royal highness regrets that various important subjects of difference with the government of the United States of America still remain unadjusted, the difficulties which the affair of the Chesapeake frigate had occasioned have been finally removed; and we are directed to assure you, that in the further progress of the discussions with the United States, the prince-regent will continue to employ such means of conciliation as may be consistent with the honor and dignity of his majesty's crown, and with the due maintenance of the maritime and commercial rights and interests of the British empire.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,—His royal highness has directed the estimates for the service of the current year to be laid before you. He trusts that you will furnish him with such supplies as may be necessary to enable him to continue the contest in which his majesty is engaged, with that spirit and exertion which will afford the best prospect of its successful termination.

"His royal highness commands us to recommend that you should resume the consideration of the finances of Ireland, which you had commenced in the last session of parliament. He has the satisfaction to inform you, that the improved receipt of the revenue of Ireland in the last, as compared with the preceding year, confirms the belief that the depression which that revenue had experienced is to be attributed to accidental and temporary causes.

"My lords and gentlemen,—The prince-regent is satisfied that you will entertain a just sense of the arduous duties which his royal highness has been called upon to fulfil, in consequence of his majesty's continued indisposition.

"Under this severe calamity, his royal highness derives the greatest consolation from his reliance on your experienced wisdom, loyalty, and public spirit, to which in every difficulty he will resort, with a firm confidence, that, through your assistance and support, he shall be enabled, under the blessings of divine providence, successfully to discharge the important functions of the high trust reposed in him, and in the name and on the behalf of his beloved father and revered sovereign, to maintain unimpaired the prosperity and honor of the nation."

The thanks of parliament were voted to the respective general officers and admirals employed in the late conquests in the east, and the Honorable Major-general Cole received personally the thanks of the house for his gallant conduct in the battle of Albuera. An annuity of 2,000*l.* in addition to former annuities, was also granted to General the Earl of Wellington.

On the 12th of January, the Marshal Count Suchet sent an account of the capture of Valencia to his government, which capitulated on the 9th. He stated, that the lines were six thousand toises in extent, and that Valencia expended twelve millions of reals, and employed some thousands of men for two years in erecting them. By the surrender of Valencia, the French took 374 pieces of artillery, 180,000 pounds of powder, 3,000,000 of cartridges, 16,131 prisoners of the line, 1,950 sick in the hospitals, 1,800 cavalry and artillery horses, 21 stands of colours, 893 officers, and 22 generals or brigadiers. Bonaparte, on this occasion, created Suchet Duke of Albufera.

By the acquisition of Valencia, the enemy obtained possession not only of the chief part of the Spanish regular forces, consisting of upwards of 16,000 men, but also of an entire province, which from its situation gave him the command of the sea-coast of the Mediterranean, from Barcelona to the Straits of Gibraltar.

The following account of this city is extracted from "Travels in Spain." "Valencia is one of the noblest cities in all Spain, situate in a large vega, or valley, above sixty miles in compass: here are the strongest silks, the sweetest wines, the excellentest almonds, the best oils, and most beautiful females of all Spain, for the prime courtizans in Madrid and elsewhere are had hence. The very brute animals make themselves beds of rosemary, and other fragrant flowers, hereabouts; and when one is at sea, if the wind blows from the shore, he may smell this soil before he comes in sight of it, many leagues off, by the strong odoriferous scent it casts. As it is the most pleasant, so it is also the most temperate clime of all Spain; and they commonly call it the second Italy, which made the Moors, whereof many thousands were destroyed and banished hence to Barbary, to think that paradise was in that part of the heavens which hung over this city."

Soon after the fall of Valencia, the following proclamation was issued at Alicant, in the Spanish language, by Mr. Tupper. This admirable paper was addressed to the inhabitants of the kingdom of Valencia, and very generally distributed among them.

"When the sacred duty of maintaining your rights, your independence, and national honor, decided you gloriously to declare yourselves against the perfidy and treachery consummated at Bayonne, against your innocent and outraged king, you did me the honor to elect me a member of the government which then exercised the sovereignty, in order to concur in directing your enthusiasm and noble determination; and all unanimously declared eternal war against the usurper of your rights. I accepted, with satisfaction, so honorable a distinction, and I swore to accomplish, by all the means in my power, your heroic intentions. Your cause was noble, just, and necessary; and by a happy chance I was the first Englishman that united himself to you, to oppose the fraudulent and ambitious views of Napoleon. Your admirable decrees,—your decision,—your valour,—and your sacrifices, we remember them all with delight; and though fate has condemned you, in these days of mourning, to groan beneath the yoke of usurpation, your noble breasts are still animated with the same sentiments, the same ardour, and the same patriotism. Your former heroic defence filled Europe with admiration; your oppressors, in announcing it to the world, proclaimed your virtues, and at the same time manifested your resistance and inextinguishable hatred to the tyrannical dominion of the usurper.

"Perhaps, for a short time, you may be flattered with illusive promises; but soon will you fatally experience, that treason, ferocity, and perfidy, are the consequences of the operations which give rise to his iniquitous invasion.

"You, Valencians, have fulfilled your duties, have observed your oaths; and your enemies bitterly confess, that your will and your opinions are not and cannot be conquered. All the bayonets and all the satellites of Napoleon are insufficient to gain the heart of one Spaniard worthy of that honorable name. But with what surprise and contempt must the whole world have observed, that the kingdom of Valencia now remains condemned to a state of orphanism, without representative authorities; and that its former members,—timid, cowardly, without mind or dignity, or perhaps without character,—wrapped up in doubtful principles, vilely abandoned the sacred duties with which they were entrusted; and at the first alarm,—at the first reverse of fortune,

BOOK IX. when they ought to have shewn the greatest firmness and patriotism,—shamefully fled, resigned their authority, and placed themselves in the midst of your enemies, to adorn the triumphal car of a conqueror, who tramples on all that men hold most holy and respectable. What example, and what spectacle has the Junta of Valencia just exhibited! What indelible opprobrium for its members,—what dishonor for this kingdom, that with justice prided itself on being the first to raise the neck against the Napoleonic treason.

CHAP. XII.
1812.

“At the commencement of the Spanish revolution, you, Valencians, unanimously declared war against your oppressors, without arms, without necessities, and without troops; and by the efforts of a generous people, governed by men of decided patriotism, armies and resources were soon created: but now the fruits, the anxieties, and the labours of three years are in danger of being annihilated by the criminal conduct of your imbecile and pusillanimous representatives. Such men were unworthy to direct and govern you. Their proceedings must be an object of abomination to the French themselves, whose protection they slavishly implore. Where are the oaths of your representatives? Did no resources remain in the kingdom? Did none of our strong places remain, no troops, no public spirit? The nation, Valencians, exists, and will continue to exist, notwithstanding the effects of treason or of weakness: and to the nation belong those unfortunate districts now traitorously abandoned to themselves. And what is the example at the same time exhibited by Arragon, Guadalaxara, Soria, and Catalonia, your neighbours? There you may see the public authorities, even in the midst of the enemy, exciting the public virtue, and declaring eternal war against the vile usurper of the throne. Their illustrious members have added new lustre to the Spanish name; but you, junta of Valencia, sealed with ignominy, are worthy neither of the French nor Spanish name. Your desertion, unexampled in Spain, blots you from the list which distinguishes her sons, and condemns you to the black class of men without a country.

“In fine, inhabitants of the kingdom of Valencia, new authorities worthy of your confidence are about to arise. They will give an energetic and brilliant impulse to your valour and patriotism. Your resources are great, the national spirit one: you will equal or exceed the Gallicians or Catalonians in disinterestedness, enthusiasm, or virtue. They disdained to dishonor themselves with the slavish name of Frenchmen; and will you, Valencians, conduct yourselves with less dignity and with less spirit than they? No, from the present misfortunes will spring up a sacred flame which will consume your oppressors. In all parts there are Spaniards; and do not doubt that the happy day of the restoration of Valencia will yet arrive.

“In Catalonia, a formidable army is organizing; and General Lacy is besieging Tarragona.

“Nearly all the interior of Spain is free from enemies; and the divisions of Mina, Duran, Empecinado, Amor, Montijo, and others, appear with a formidable aspect, and increase considerably.

“In Alicant the army rejoins; and the English general, Roche, in the service of Spain, has undertaken to pay, clothe, and arm the garrison, and every soldier that presents himself to him; who may soon be in a condition to combat the enemy, now proud of his conquest.

“In Majorca formidable forces are organizing, which will soon triumph in the Peninsula.

“In Carthagea a new army is forming.

“In La Mancha is a numerous division in a respectable condition; and the fortress of Las Penas de San Pedro is the bulwark of its liberty.

“General Ballasteros continues victorious, and his division increases every day more and more. Before Tariffa 3,000 enemies have been routed by General Copons and the English; and have been obliged to raise the siege of that fortress, losing all their artillery, after a practicable breach had been opened, from whence sallied the English colonel, Skerrett, with 2,000 men. In Cadiz an army of more than 30,000 men is rapidly organizing; and the besieging enemy confess, with dismay, that Cadiz is impregnable.

“In Estremadura, all the country is free (the enemy only possessing the spot on which he stands;) and its resources and troops are put in action.

“Gallicia respires equally free, and contains a numerous and warlike army.

“Asturias, invaded, for the fourth time, by the enemy, has obliged them to abandon that ancient asylum of the liberty of Spain.

“In Castile is a disciplined army, under the command of General Mendizabel; and finally, the allied army, under the illustrious Wellington, menaces the enemy in various points, and occupies the greater part of his forces.

“Such is the state of the efforts of the nation to secure its independence, and purge its territory of a cruel, devastating, and perfidious enemy. And shall Valencia remain out of the list of the valiant provinces which do honor to the nation? Will she consent to be blotted out of the map of Europe, and to see herself attached to the great and usurped yoke of Napoleon?

“Valencians! you have still an opportunity; it is still in your power to choose between the ignominy of becoming Frenchmen and the glory of calling yourselves Spaniards. We cannot waver as to your noble reply. ‘Spaniards we are,’ is resounded on all sides. Catalonia, Arragon, Soria, all Spain, in fine, give us an example, and teach us our duties.

“Re-unite, then, in parties truly patriotic, ac-

Major General, Henry Mackinnon

Engraved for Gifford's History of the War, by H.R. Cook from a Miniature by Jaeger

London Published June 1836, by W^m Lewis & Co. Old Fish St.

cording to the disposition of the supreme government, intercept the enemy's convoys, and prevent the forced imposition of contributions, of devastations, and plunder. Whatever you seize from the enemy shall be the patrimony of your valour, and the reward of your labours. All shall be for you, and for your benefit. And that your intentions may be prosperous, you may proceed to the city of Alicant, where will be delivered to you, by my hands, arms, stores, and all things needful, which the generous English nation offer you.

"The confidence which I have felt in you, remains engraven in eternal characters in my breast; and as I was one of the first to unite myself with you to forward your noble cause, so will I be the last to abandon it, and my efforts shall be redoubled till the national independence is obtained. Sustaining your just cause, I shall have had the satisfaction of fulfilling the most precious of my duties.

"Valencians, I shall not detain you to make known my proclamations to the soldiers in the French army, to encourage desertion among them. To every German, Pole, Swiss, Italian, &c. that presents himself, will be given a gratuity of twenty dollars and clothing, with liberty to go wheresoever he pleases. By these means we may hope to weaken the force of the enemy, to deliver many unfortunate and brave men from their bonds, and to restore them to their own country.

(Signed) "P. CAREY TUPPER.

"Alicant, Feb. 14, 1812."

On the 19th of January, Lord Wellington took Ciudad Rodrigo by storm. The following is his lordship's account of this capture, addressed to Lord Liverpool, and dated

"Gallegos, January 20, 1812.

"I informed your lordship, in my dispatch of the 9th, that I had attacked Ciudad Rodrigo, and in that of the 15th, of the progress of the operations to that period; and I have now the pleasure to acquaint your lordship, that we took the place by storm yesterday evening after dark.

"We continued from the 15th to the 19th to complete the second parallel, and the communications with that work; and we had made some progress by sap towards the crest of the glacis. On the night of the 15th, we likewise advanced from the left of the first parallel down the slope of the hill, towards the convent of St. Francisco, to a situation from which the walls of the Fausse Braye and of the town were seen, on which a battery of seven guns was constructed, and they commenced their fire on the morning of the 18th.

"In the mean time, the batteries in the parallel continued their fire; and yesterday evening their fire had not only considerably injured the defences of the place, but had made breaches in the Fausse Braye wall, and in the body of the place, which were considered practicable; while the battery on the slope of the hill, which had been commenced on the night of the 15th, and had opened on the 18th, had been equally efficient still farther to the left, and opposite to the suburb of St. Francisco.

"I therefore determined to storm the place, notwithstanding that the approaches had not been brought to the crest of the glacis, and the counterscarp of the ditch was still entire. The attack was accordingly made yesterday evening in five separate columns, consisting of the troops of the 3d and right divisions, and of Brigadier-general Pack's brigade. The two light columns, conducted by Lieutenant-colonel O'Toole, of the 2d caçadores, and Major Ridge, of the 5th regiment, were destined to protect the advance of Major-general Mackinnon's brigade, forming the third, to the top of the breach in the Fausse Braye wall; and all these, being composed of troops of the 3d division, were under the direction of Lieutenant-general Picton.

"The fourth column, consisting of the 43d and 52d regiments, and part of the 95th regiment, being of the light division, under the direction of Major-general Craufurd, attacked the breaches on the left, in front of the suburb of St. Francisco and covered the left of the attack of the principal breach by the troops of the 3d division; and Brigadier-general Pack was destined, with his brigade, forming the 5th column, to make a false attack upon the southern face of the fort. Besides these five columns, the 94th regiment, belonging to the 3d division, descended into the ditch, in two columns of the right of Major-general Mackinnon's brigade, with a view to protect the descent of that body into the ditch, and its attack of the breach in the Fausse Braye, against the obstacles which it was supposed the enemy would construct to oppose their progress.

"All these attacks succeeded; and Brigadier-general Pack even surpassed my expectations, having converted his false attack into a real one, and his advanced-guard, under the command of Major Lynch, having followed the enemy's troops from the advanced works into the Fausse Braye, where they made prisoners of all opposed to them.

"Major Ridge, of the 2d battalion of the 5th regiment, having escalated the Fausse Braye wall, stormed the principal breach in the body of the place, together with the 94th regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Campbell, which had moved along the ditch at the same time, and had stormed the breach in the Fausse Braye, both in front of Major-general Mackinnon's brigade. Thus these regiments not only effectually covered the advance from the trenches of Major-general Mackinnon's brigade by their first movements and operations, but they preceded them in the attack.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. XII.

1812.

“Major-general Craufurd and Major-general Vandeleur, and the troops of the light division on the left, were likewise very forward on that side; and in less than half an hour from the time the attack commenced, our troops were in possession of, and formed on the ramparts of the place, each body contiguous to the other. The enemy then submitted, having sustained a considerable loss in the contest.

“Our loss was also, I am concerned to add, severe, particularly in officers of high rank and estimation in this army. Major-general Mackinnon was unfortunately blown up by the accidental explosion of one of the enemy's expence magazines, close to the breach, after he had gallantly and successfully led the troops under his command to the attack. Major-general Craufurd likewise received a severe wound while he was leading on the light division to the storm, and I am apprehensive that I shall be deprived for some time of his assistance. Major-general Vandeleur was likewise wounded in the same manner, but not so severely, and he was able to continue in the field. I have to add to this list, Lieutenant-colonel Colbourne, of the 53d regiment, and Major-general Napier, who led the storming party of the light division, and was wounded on the top of the breach.

“I have great pleasure in reporting to your lordship the uniform good conduct, spirit of enterprise, and patience and perseverance in the performance of great labour, by which the general officers, officers, and troops of the 1st, 3d, 4th, and light divisions, and Brigadier-general Pack's brigade, by whom the siege was carried on, have been distinguished during the late operations. Lieutenant-general Graham assisted me in superintending the conduct of the details of the siege, besides performing the duties of the general officer commanding the first division; and I am much indebted to the suggestions and assistance I received from him for the success of this enterprise.

“The conduct of all parts of the 3d division; in the operations which they performed with so much gallantry and exactness, on the evening of the 19th, in the dark, afford the strongest proof of the abilities of Lieutenant-general Picton and Major-general Mackinnon, by whom they were directed and led; but I beg particularly to draw your lordship's attention to the conduct of Lieutenant-colonel O'Toole of the 2d caçadores, of Major Ridge of 2d battalion 5th foot, of Lieut.-colonel Campbell of the 94th regiment, of Major Manners of the 74th, and of Major Grey of the 2d battalion 5th foot, who has been twice wounded during this siege.

“It is but justice also to the 3d division to report, that the men who performed the sap belonged to the 45th, 74th, and 88th regiments, under the command of Captain M'Leod of the royal engineers, and Captain Thompson of the 74th, Lieutenant Beresford of the 88th, and Lieutenant Metcalf of the 45th, and they distinguished themselves not less in the storm of the place, than they had in their performance of their laborious duty during the siege.

“I have already reported, in my letter of the 9th instant, my sense of the conduct of Major-general Craufurd, and of Lieutenant-colonel Colbourne, and of the troops of the light division, in the storm of the redoubt of St. Francisco, on the evening of the 8th instant. The conduct of these troops was equally distinguished throughout the siege; and in the storm, nothing could exceed the gallantry with which these brave officers and troops advanced and accomplished the difficult operation allotted to them, notwithstanding that all their leaders had fallen.

“I particularly request your lordship's attention to the conduct of Major-general Craufurd, Major-general Vandeleur, Lieutenant-colonel Barnard of the 95th, Lieutenant-colonel Colbourne, Major Gibbs, and Major Napier of the 52d, and Lieutenant-colonel M'Leod of the 43d. The conduct of Captain Duffy of the 43d, and that of Lieutenant Gurwood of the 52d regiment, who was wounded, have likewise been particularly reported to me; Lieutenant-colonel Elder, and the 3d caçadores, were likewise distinguished upon this occasion.

“The 1st Portuguese regiment, under Lieutenant-colonel Hill, and the 16th, under Colonel Campbell, being Brigadier-general Pack's brigade, were likewise distinguished in the storm, under the command of the brigadier-general, who particularly mentions Major Lynch.

“In my dispatch of the 15th, I reported to your lordship the attack of the Convent of Santa Cruz, by the troops of the 1st division, under the direction of Lieutenant-general Graham, and that of the convent of Saint Francisco, on the 14th instant, under the direction of Major-general the Hon. C. Colville. The first-mentioned enterprise was performed by Captain Laroche de Stackenfels, of the 1st line battalion king's German legion; the last by Lieutenant-colonel Harcourt, with the 40th regiment. This regiment remained from that time in the suburb of Saint Francisco, and materially assisted our attack on that side of the place.

“Although it did not fall to the lot of the troops of the 1st and 4th divisions to bring these operations to their successful close, they distinguished themselves throughout their progress, by the patience and perseverance with which they performed the labours of the siege. The brigade of guards, under Major-general H. Campbell, was particularly distinguished in this respect.

“I likewise request your lordship's attention to the conduct of Lieutenant-colonel Fletcher, the chief engineer, and of Brigade-major Jones, and the officers and men of the royal engineers.—The ability with which these operations were carried on exceeds all praise; and I beg leave to recommend those officers to your lordship most particularly.

“Major Dickson, of the royal artillery, attached to the Portuguese artillery, has for some time had the direction of the heavy train attached to this army, and has conducted the intricate details of the late operation, as he did those of the late sieges of Badajoz, in the last summer, much to my satisfaction. The rapid execution produced by the well-directed fire kept up from our batteries, affords the best proof of the merits of the officers and men of the royal artillery, and of the Portuguese artillery employed on this occasion. But I must particularly mention Brigade-major May, and Captains Holcombe, Power, Dynely, and Dundas, of the royal artillery; and Captains Da Cunha and Da Costa, and Lieutenant Silva, of the 1st regiment of Portuguese artillery.

“I have likewise particularly to report to your lordship, the conduct of Major Sturgeon, of the royal staff corps. He constructed and placed for us the bridge over the Agueda, without which the enterprise could not have been attempted, and he afterwards materially assisted Lieutenant-general Graham and myself, in our reconnoissance of the place, on which the plan of the attack was founded; and he finally conducted the 2d battalion of the 5th regiment, as well as the 2d caçadores, to their points of attack.

“The adjutant-general, and the deputy quarter-master-general, and the officers of their several departments, gave me every assistance throughout this service, as well as those of my personal staff; and I have great pleasure in adding, that, notwithstanding the season of the year, and the increased difficulties of procuring supplies for the troops, the whole army have been well supplied, and every branch of the service provided for during the late operations, by the indefatigable exertions of Mr. Commissary-general Bisset, and the officers belonging to his department.

“The Marshal del Campo, Don Carlos d’Espana, and Don Julian Sanchez, observed the enemy’s movements beyond the Tormes, during the operations of the siege; and I am much obliged to them, and to the people of Castile in general, for the assistance I received from them. The latter have invariably shewn their detestation of the French tyranny, and their desire to contribute, by every means in their power, to remove it.

“I will, hereafter, transmit to your lordship a detailed account of what we have found in the place; but I believe there are 153 pieces of ordnance, including the heavy train belonging to the French army, and great quantities of ammunition and stores. We have the governor, General

Banier, about 78 officers, and 1,700 men prisoners.

“I transmit this dispatch by my aid-de-camp, the Hon. Major Gordon, who will give your lordship any farther details you may require; and I beg leave to recommend him to your protection.—I have the honor to be, &c.

“WELLINGTON.”

On the 4th of February, the fortress of Peniscola was taken by the French. This fortress is situated on a rock insulated by the sea, near the great road, one league from Benecarlos, and is only connected with the continent by a tongue of sand, thirty toises in breadth and sixty in length. An old castle of the Templers, built on the summit, is surrounded by the town, containing 2,000 inhabitants, and with a fortification of sufficient extent, guarded by several ranges of batteries. A garrison of 1,000 men defended the place, under the orders of Brigadier Garcio Navarro, a man of rank, who was taken prisoner in 1811, at Falcet, and made his escape. Five English vessels cruised on the coast, and communicated with the place, which thus received continual succour from without.

Some time after the taking of Ciudad Rodrigo, Lord Wellington laid siege to Badajoz. On the 25th of March he opened batteries on an outwork of that fortress called La Picuina, which he took by storm on the 26th. At length, on the 6th of April, Badajoz was taken by storm.

On the night of the storming of Bajadoz, which was not in the possession of the English till after six hours hard fighting, a letter from an officer stated that the carnage was horrible to the last degree. The French had employed every imaginable contrivance for repelling the assault. From the peculiar situation of the place it was necessary to scale, although a large breach was effected: the enemy threw down the ladders as fast as they were reared, and thus precipitated whole companies into the fosse. When at last the English established themselves on the walls and leaped down, they fell on chevaux de frize formed of old swords ground to the utmost sharpness. There were trenches and breastworks across the streets, and these also undermined ready for blowing up.

It must be confessed, that this conquest was dearly purchased, 1,035 men having been killed, and 4,822 wounded, and the majority severely. The following was Lord Wellington’s account?

“The fire continued during the 4th and 5th against the face of the bastion of La Trinidad, and the flank of the bastion of Santa Maria; and on the 4th, in the morning, we opened another battery of six guns, in the second parallel, against the shoulder of the ravelin of St Roque, and the wall in its gorge.

“Practicable breaches were effected in the

9 L

BOOK IX.
CHAP. XII.
1812.

bastions above-mentioned, in the evening of the 5th; but as I had observed that the enemy had entrenched the bastion of La Trinidad, and the most formidable preparations were making for the defence as well of the breach in that bastion, as of that in the bastion of Santa Maria, I determined to delay the attack for another day, and to turn all the guns in the batteries in the second parallel on the curtain of La Trinidad, in hopes that by effecting a third breach, the troops would be enabled to turn the enemy's works for the defence of the other two, the attack of which would besides be connected by the troops destined to attack the breach in the curtain.

"This breach was effected in the evening of the 6th, and the fire of the face of the bastion of Santa Maria, and of the flank of the bastion of La Trinidad being overcome, I determined to attack the place that night.

"I had kept in reserve, in the neighbourhood of this camp, the 5th division, under Lieutenant-general Leith, which had left Castile only in the middle of March, and had but lately arrived in this part of the country, and I brought them up on that evening.

"The plan for the attack was, that Lieutenant-general Picton should attack the castle of Badajoz by escalade with the third division; and a detachment from the guard in the trenches, furnished that evening by the 4th division, under Major Wilson of the 48th regiment, should attack the ravelin of St. Roque upon his left; while the 4th division, under the Honorable Major-general Colville, and the light division, under Lieutenant-colonel Barnard, should attack the breaches in the bastions of La Trinidad and of Santa Maria, and in the curtain by which they are connected. The 5th division were to occupy the ground which the 4th and light divisions had occupied during the siege; and Lieutenant-general Leith was to make a false attack upon the outwork called Pardeleras, and another on the works of the fort towards the Guadiana, with the left brigade of the division, under Major-general Walker, which he was to turn into a real attack, if circumstances should prove favorable; and Brigadier-general Power, who invested the place with his Portuguese brigade on the right of the Guadiana, was directed to make false attacks on the tête-du-pont, the fort St. Christoval, and the new redoubt called Monceur.

"The attack was accordingly made at ten at night. Lieutenant-general Picton preceding, by a few minutes, the attack by the remainder of the troops.

"Major-general Kempt led this attack, which went out from the right of the first parallel; he was unfortunately wounded in crossing the river Rivellas below the inundation; but notwithstanding this circumstance, and the obstinate resistance of the enemy, the castle was carried by escalade, and the 3d division established in it at about half-past eleven.

"While this was going on, Major Wilson, of the 48th regiment, carried the ravelin of St. Roque by the gorge, with a detachment of 200 men of the guard in the trenches, and, with the assistance of Major Squire, of the engineers, established himself within that work.

"The 4th and light divisions moved to the attack from the camp along the left of the river Rivellas and of the inundation. They were not perceived by the enemy till they reached the covered-way, and the advanced-guards of the two divisions descended, without difficulty, into the ditch, protected by the fire of the parties stationed on the glacis for that purpose; and they advanced to the assault of the breaches, led by their gallant officers, with the utmost intrepidity: but such was the nature of the obstacles prepared by the enemy at the top and behind the breaches, and so determined their resistance, that our troops could not establish themselves within the place. Many brave officers and soldiers were killed or wounded by explosions at the top of the breaches; others who succeeded to them were obliged to give way, having found it impossible to penetrate the obstacles which the enemy had prepared to impede their progress. These attempts were repeated till after twelve at night, when, finding that success was not to be attained, and that Lieutenant-general Picton was established in the castle, I ordered that the 4th and light divisions might retire to the ground on which they had first assembled for the attack.

"In the mean time, Major-general Leith had pushed forward Major-general Walker's brigade on the left, supported by the 38th regiment under Lieutenant-colonel Nugent, and the 15th Portuguese regiment under Lieutenant-colonel De Regoa; and he had made a false attack upon the Pardeleras with the 8th caçadores, under Major Hill. Major-general Walker forced the barrier on the road of Olivença, and entered the covered-way on the left of the bastion of St. Vicente, close to the Guadiana. He there descended into the ditch, and escaladed the face of the bastion of St. Vicente.

"Lieutenant-general Leith supported this attack by the 38th regiment, and the 15th Portuguese regiment; and our troops being thus established in the castle, which commands all the works of the town, and in the town; and the 4th and light divisions being formed again for the attack of the breaches, all resistance ceased; and at day-light in the morning, the governor, General Philipon, who had retired to Fort St. Christoval, surrendered, together with General Vellande, and all the staff, and the whole garrison."

While Lord Wellington was employed in the siege of Badajoz, the French were by no means inactive; they made a very considerable diversion on the northern bank of the Tagus, which, though not successful in the relief of Badajoz, its original intent, was yet productive of very injurious consequences. Marmont overrun an immense range of country, even to the vicinity of Abrantes. In this excursion the plunder he acquired was considerable, but the property he destroyed was much greater. On the south of the Tagus, however, the British arms were crowned with success. The cavalry of Soult, with a similar view to that of Marmont, had advanced as far as Villa Franca, where they were overtaken and defeated by Sir Stapylton Cotton, April 11. During the action the enemy's loss was very considerable, and about 150 prisoners, including a lieutenant-colonel, two captains, and one lieutenant, with about 130 horses, were brought off the field.

April 27, a vote of thanks to the Earl of Wellington, for the capture of Badajoz, was unanimously carried in both houses of parliament. Thanks were also unanimously voted to General Beresford and the other generals of Lord Wellington's army, and to the officers of engineers, and the officers of artillery, British and Portuguese, for the professional ability displayed by them.

On the 19th of May, General Sir Rowland Hill obtained a victory over the French at Almaraz, in which the enemy had about 100 killed and 300 taken prisoners. The loss on the part of the English was one captain, one lieutenant, one serjeant, thirty rank and file killed; two captains, six lieutenants, five ensigns, ten serjeants, one drummer, and 120 rank and file wounded. The following is an extract of General Hill's letter to Lord Wellington on this occasion, dated Truxillo, May 21.

"My Lord,—I have the satisfaction to acquaint your lordship, that your instructions, relative to the capture and destruction of the enemy's works at Almaraz, have been most fully carried into effect by a detachment of troops under my orders, which marched from Almendralejo on the 12th instant.

"The bridge was protected by strong works thrown up by the French on both sides of the river, and further covered on the southern side by the castle and redoubts of Mirabete, about a league off, commanding the pass of that name, through which runs the road to Madrid, being the only one passable for carriages of any description by which the bridge can be approached.

"The works on the left bank of the river were a tête-du-pont, built of masonry, and strongly entrenched, and on the high ground above it, a large and well-constructed fort called Napoleon, with an inferior entrenchment, and loop-holed tower in its centre. This fort contained nine pieces of cannon, with a garrison of between 4 and 500 men. There being also on the opposite side of the river, on a height immediately above the bridge, a very complete fort recently constructed, which flanked and added much to its defence.

"On the morning of the 16th, the troops reached Jeraicejo, and the same evening marched in three columns: the left column, commanded by Lieutenant-general Chowne (28th and 34th regiments, under Colonel Wilson, and the 6th Portuguese caçadores) towards the castle of Mirabete; the right column, under Major-general Howard, (30th, 71st, and 92d regiments) which I accompanied myself to a pass in the mountains, through which a most difficult and circuitous foot-path leads by the village of Romangordo to the bridge; the centre-column, under Major-general Long, (6th and 18th Portuguese infantry, under Colonel Ashworth, and 13th light dragoons, with the artillery) advanced upon the high-road to the pass of Mirabete.

"The two flank-columns were provided with ladders, and it was intended that either of them should proceed to escalade the forts against which they were directed, had circumstances proved favorable; the difficulties, however, which each had to encounter on its march were such, that it was impossible for them to reach their respective points before day-break; I judged it best, therefore, as there was no longer a possibility of surprise, to defer the attack, until we should be better acquainted with the nature and position of the works, and the troops bivouacked on the Leiza.

"I determined on endeavouring to penetrate to the bridge by the mountain path, leading through the village of Romangordo, although by that means I should be deprived of the use of my artillery.

"On the evening of the 18th I moved with Major-general Howard's brigade, and the 6th Portuguese regiment, for the operation, provided with scaling-ladders, &c. Although the distance marched did not exceed five or six miles, the difficulties of the road were such, that with the united exertions of officers and men, the column could not be formed for the attack before daylight. Confiding, however, in the valour of the troops, I ordered the immediate assault of Fort Napoleon. My confidence was fully justified by the event.

"The 1st battalion of the 50th, and one wing of the 71st regiment, regardless of the enemy's artillery and musketry, escaladed the work in three places nearly at the same time. The enemy seemed, at first, determined, and his fire was destructive; but the ardour of our troops was irresistible, and the garrison was driven at the point of the bayonet, through the several entrenchments of the fort and tête-du-pont, across the bridge, which having been cut by those on the opposite side of the river, many leaped into the river and thus perished.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. XII.

1812.

"The impression made upon the enemy's troops was such, that panic soon communicated itself to those on the right bank of the river, and Fort Ragusa was instantly abandoned, the garrison flying in the greatest confusion towards Naval Moral.

"I cannot sufficiently praise the conduct of the 50th and 71st regiments, to whom the assault fell. The cool and steady manner in which they formed and advanced, and the intrepidity with which they mounted the ladders, and carried the place, was worthy of those distinguished corps, and the officers who led them.

"Could the attack have been made before day, the 92d regiment, under Lieutenant-colonel Cameron, and the remainder of the 71st regiment, under the Honorable Lieutenant-colonel Cadogan, were to have escalated the tête-du-pont, and effected the destruction of the bridge, at the same time that the attack was made on Fort Napoleon. The impossibility of advancing deprived them of this opportunity of distinguishing themselves, but the share which they had in the operation, and the zeal which they displayed, entitles them to my warmest commendation, and I cannot avoid to mention the steadiness and good discipline of the 6th Portuguese infantry, and two companies of the 60th regiment, under Colonel Ashworth, which formed the reserve to this attack.

"Our operations in this quarter were much favored by a diversion made by Lieutenant-general Chowne, with the troops under his orders, against the Castle of Mirabete, which succeeded in inducing the enemy to believe that we should not attack the forts near the bridge, until we had forced the pass, and thus have made way for our artillery. The lieutenant-general conducted this operation, as well as his former advance, entirely to my satisfaction. I regret much that the peculiar situation of Mirabete should have prevented my allowing the gallant corps under his orders to follow up an operation which they had commenced with much spirit, and were so anxious to complete.

"I cannot too strongly express how much I am satisfied with the conduct of Major-general Howard through the whole of this operation, the most arduous part of which has fallen to his share; and particularly of the manner in which he led his brigade to the assault. He was ably assisted by his staff Brigade-major Wemyss, of the 50th, and Lieutenant Battersby, of the 23d light dragoons.

"To Major-general Long I am also indebted for his assistance, although his column was not immediately engaged.

"Lieutenant-colonel Stewart and Major Harrison, of the 50th, and Major Cother, of the 71st, commanded the three attacks, and led them in a most gallant and spirited manner.

"I have received the greatest assistance from Lieutenant-colonel Dickson, of the royal artillery, whom, with a brigade of twenty 4-pounders, a company of British, and one of Portuguese artillery, your lordship was pleased to put under my orders. Circumstances did not permit his guns being brought into play; but his exertions, and those of his officers and men during the attack and destruction of the place, were unwearied. In the latter service Lieutenant Thiele, of the royal German artillery, was blown up; and we have to regret in him a most gallant officer; he had particularly distinguished himself in the assault. Lieutenant Wright, of the royal engineers, has also rendered me very essential service; he is a most intelligent, gallant, and meritorious officer; and I must not omit also to mention Lieutenant Hillier, of the 29th regiment, whose knowledge of this part of the country proved of great assistance.

"Almarez has been considered by the enemy in the light of a most important station; and I am happy to state that its destruction has been most complete. The towers of masonry which were in forts Napoleon and Ragusa have been entirely levelled; the ramparts of both in great measure destroyed; and the whole apparatus of the bridge, together with the work-shops, magazines, and every piece of timber which could be found, entirely destroyed.

"A colour, belonging to the fourth battalion of the corps étranger, was taken by the 71st regiment.

"Our loss has not been severe, considering the circumstances under which the attack was made. Captain Caudler, of the 50th regiment (the only officer killed in the assault) has, I am sorry to say, left a large family to deplore his loss. He was one of the first to mount the ladder, and fell upon the parapet, after giving a distinguished example to his men."

In consequence of the success of General Hill, Lord Wellington advanced towards Salamanca, which he reached on the 16th of June. The same night the French evacuated the town, leaving about 800 men in the fortifications which they had erected on the ruins of the colleges and convents which they had destroyed. The British entered the town on the 17th. While the French were in possession of Salamanca, they destroyed thirteen of twenty-five convents, and twenty-two out of twenty-five colleges, which existed in this celebrated seat of learning.

Major-general Slade had an action with his cavalry against that of the French under General L'Allemand. At first the British appeared to be successful, and the French retreated; but returning to the charge, they completely threw the English into confusion, and repulsed them. The loss on the part of the English was, two serjeants, twenty rank and file killed; twenty-six rank and file wounded; two officers, ten serjeants, 106 rank and file missing; one officer's horse wounded; one missing; six troop-horses killed; fourteen wounded; 127 missing. Those missing were taken prisoners by the French.

Although Lord Wellington had entered Salamanca on the 17th of June, he did not obtain possession of the forts till the 27th. The loss of the allied army employed against Salamanca was, in killed, wounded, and missing, 509.

As the fall of Salamanca was a very serious issue in the fortune of the French on the Peninsula, Marmont, and the other French generals, spared no efforts to save it, and as far as was in their power, to awe the allied army from attempting the forts. It is not very often in the operations of the field, that one army will venture a siege or an assault upon fortified works, whilst the hostile army is immediately at hand,—in its flank or rear. Marmont, therefore, moved up to Salamanca, and took a position immediately opposite to the English and Portuguese army. After remaining a day and a night on the ground, the enemy commenced, as it were, an active operation, by seizing an important post; but Lord Wellington, upon his own part, immediately attacked them,—drove them in the instant from the post they had anticipated and occupied, and on the following day compelled them to depart even from their main position.

The next movement of Marmont was equally defeated by the skill and foresight of Lord Wellington. Marmont withdrew his army laterally, as it were, so as to throw his left wing upon a river, upon the other side of which were his own forts, so that his object, by these means, was to effect his communication with them without risking a battle with the allies—at least unless the allies should attack him. His left wing, therefore, was stationed at the ford of the above-mentioned river. Lord Wellington, however, here again saw his purpose, and again foiled him. By changing the front of his own army, he opposed its face immediately to the ford and to the possible passage of the river. The effect of this movement was directly to defeat the purposes of the French general, who made a futile attempt, and then, in despair, gave up all hopes of accomplishing the relief.

The affair of storming the forts was conducted on the part of his lordship and the British army with equal skill and valour. He gave an evidence of his prompt decision when he refused the offer of the capitulation of one of the principal of them, because he could see that the sole purpose of the offer was to gain some valuable time, during which the fire might be extinguished; and the condition of the enemy much improved. It was another act of promptitude, and of availing himself of circumstances, that having found that the governors of two of the forts were but subordinate officers, and could not act for themselves, however they might be inclined to capitulate, he ordered the fire to be directed upon the fort under the commander-in-chief of the station. This fire was successful, the chief governor surrendered, and the other minor forts fell of course.

The indefatigable and gallant leader Espoz y Mina, continued to harass the enemy in all directions—intercepting his convoys, cutting off his supplies, and making him feel, when least he expected it, the vengeance of his arm. In one affair he killed 700 French, wounded 500, released about 500 prisoners, who had been made in the late conflicts with Ballasteros, and took a large quantity of ammunition and other necessities.

On the 22d of July, the French army, under the command of Marshal Marmont, was defeated by that of the allies, commanded by Lord Wellington, Duke of Ciudad Rodrigo, in the fields of Salamanca, after seven hours continued fighting, in which the infantry, as well as the cavalry and artillery of both nations, performed prodigies of valour. The French were successively dislodged from their advantageous positions, and lost all the artillery which they had placed there. Their loss in men was at first estimated at 10 or 12,000, and afterwards greater, an immense number having been taken prisoners. The enemy lost many eagles, almost all his baggage, and an immense quantity of military stores. The loss of the allies in killed, wounded, and missing, by the return made afterwards, was 5,879. General Marmont was wounded by a shell towards the close of the battle, near the right shoulder, and so badly, that he was forced to be carried off the field in a litter, by six grenadiers. At Penaranda his arm was amputated.

Dispatches were received from the Earl of Wellington, dated the 13th and 15th of August, which contained intelligence of the allied army having entered Madrid, after an inconsiderable resistance on the 12th. On the capture of Madrid the allies took 2,500 prisoners, 189 pieces of cannon, 900 barrels of powder, 23,254 stand of arms, and great magazines of clothing, provisions, and ammunition.

Whilst his lordship was at Madrid, the French employed their time to the best advantage. Marmont departed for France, and General Clausel took the command of the army of Portugal. Behind the fortifications of Burgos, he employed the time in repairing the ruin and dilapidation consequent upon a defeat. He sent out his subdivisions to collect in his garrisons on the line of the Douro, and at Astorga; and though Astorga was lost before he reached it, he added very considerable reinforcements to himself from those of Toro and Zamora. He received, moreover, another very considerable addition from the French Pyrenean frontier, and a still stronger one from General Caffarelli, the commander of the army of the north. This latter general now collected all his forces from Biscay and Galicia; and by his station became in fact the rear and component part of the army of Portugal. General Clausel or Sanham's army thus became nearly 35,000 efficient men, and, above all, possessed a most efficient cavalry.

Being informed of this state of things, Lord Wellington deemed it necessary to re-advance. He accordingly collected his forces at Arevalo, thence marched to the Douro, crossed it, and came in front of the enemy, who had re-advanced to Valladolid. As it was his lordship's purpose to pursue them to the Ebro, and thence, if possible, to the Pyrenean frontier, he followed them from Valladolid to Burgos, where he arrived on the 19th of September.

Lord Wellington had for some time laid siege to Burgos, but had hitherto been able to make but little progress, for want of a sufficient quantity of battering-cannon. He lost, during the siege, a great number of men. He had sprung several mines, but was repulsed with loss in every attempt. At length, on the 18th of October, the mine which he had prepared was sprung at seven in the morning; but the French had been employed in countermining it, and their mine exploded at the same time. The British troops immediately stormed the castle but without success; losing in this attempt upwards of 100 men killed, and a great many more wounded. So much time having been lost by Lord Wellington before this well-defended fortress, Marshal Soult and King Joseph seized the opportunity of advancing in great force towards Madrid. Fearing, therefore, that the British were not secure in the possession of the capital, Lord Wellington determined to raise the siege of Burgos, and advance to the relief of Madrid. His lordship consequently raised the siege of the castle of Burgos on the 21st of October, leaving the rear-guard of his army, under Sir Edward Paget, but without the least hope of his being successful. Lord Wellington, however, found it prudent to abandon Madrid, and continue his retreat to Portugal, for it would have been the height of madness to have risked a battle with the French forces for the salvation of the capital. Lord Wellington, when joined by General Hill, had about 50,000 effective men; but Marmont's army, consisting of nearly 40,000 men, was expected shortly to join Marshal Soult's, which amounted to between 50 and 60,000.

On the 24th of October, General Ballasteros addressed the following letter to the minister of war:

"Excellent Sir,—From the time of the surrender of Barcelona, Figueras, Pampeluna, and San Sebastian, at which epoch I was at Madrid, I began to omit no means to bring about the revolution, maintaining a communication with various provinces of Spain, and acting with an energy surpassed by none. I flatter myself that no person contributed more than I did to the success of the 2d of May, from which has resulted our present situation. The motive which animated me to act thus, was a knowledge that it was the general wish of the nation to be informed for what purpose the surrender of those fortresses was intended, notwithstanding the political manner in which they were given up.

"From that epoch I have not quitted my arms, but resisted, to the honor of my country, the attempts which have been made to injure her by a foreigner.

"Always inflexible in remaining only a Spaniard, my country has found me ready to support her under every circumstance, without regard to my fortune, which I have ever viewed, as your highness must admit, with the greatest indifference.

"I was surprised at learning that the English general, Lord Wellington, was appointed chief of the Spanish armies, by a resolution of the general Cortes. They who, to preserve the reputation of their country, lie buried in their graves—thousands upon thousands of our companions in arms—are observing our proceedings; and I should not consider myself as having been born in the kingdom of Arragon, if I did not submit to your excellency, for the information of government, that I cannot condescend to a determination that tarnishes the honor of the Spanish name, degrading the chiefs who are at their head; supposing that they do not perceive the certain superiority to which this measure must lead, particularly keeping in view the events of Barcelona, Figueras, &c. which I have already mentioned, and which took place with a nation with whom we were connected by the ties of friendship and good understanding, and of whose bad faith, and fair promises, no person can give a more satisfactory account than the Duke del Infantado, president of the regency.

"I have received an account of this event, and, in consequence, an order to move my army; an order which compromises the honor of all the individuals belonging to it, either in the capacity of citizens or military men. I cannot hide this from them, without usurping the rights which belong to them, in the event of acknowledging Lord Wellington general-in-chief of the Spanish armies,—and as the point in question is of the utmost importance to the general good of the country, I wait the resolution of your highness for my ulterior determination.

"In the same order, your excellency informs me, that Lord Wellington returns thanks to the generals of the nation, for the benefits, political and military, which they performed, to obtain the present results of the allied army. Then, to whom is to be confided the command of the armed force of the nation? Is Spain to be considered as a little kingdom of Portugal? Is not the origin of our revolution, to our honor be it spoken, different from that of the Portuguese? Have we not the honor to belong to the greatest nation in the world? Have not our arms resounded in the four quarters of the world? Can we give the command of our army to a foreigner, whatever may be our political situation, without disgracing the nation?—No, Spain has still resources; her generals, chiefs, officers, and soldiers, still fortunately preserve the honor they inherited from their forefathers; and in the present war have convinced the English and French, that in battle they display equal valour and discipline to themselves, and that their chiefs know how to conduct them to victory.

“The fields of Baylen, Albuera, Saragossa, and Gerona, with many others, which I omit to state, because I would not be thought to boast of myself, are indelible testimonies of this truth; and the fourth army, which I command, may tell the nation that in these qualities they are not inferior to any soldiers in the world; and that without degradation they cannot descend to submit to obscure the glories they have acquired, and the extraordinary services they have performed, out of compliment to Lord Wellington, although they are always ready to act in combination with him.

“Lastly, I entreat your excellency to demand the opinion of the national armies and citizens; and if they agree to this nomination, I will resign my employments, and retire to my house; to convince, in this manner, all the world, that only honor, and the good of my country, lead me to this exposition, and no ambitious views, as to fortune, which malice may sometimes attribute to me, without respecting the notoriety of my patriotism, acquired by weight of constancy, and signal services.

“F. BALLASTEROS.

“Head-quarters, Grenada, Oct. 24.

“To his Excellency the Minister at War.”

The following was the reply of Don Francisco Ballasteros to the dispatch by which he received his dismissal from his command.

“Most excellent Sir,—This morning, while engaged in the ordinary dispatch of business, I received your excellency’s dispatch, discharging me from the command of the captainship-general of the four kingdoms of Andalusia, and of the fourth army; informing me, at the same time, that my troops had formed, and were marching in the direction of Alcala; I immediately mounted my horse to learn from what source proceeded a measure so contrary to the spirit of the royal ordinances, and the discipline with which I have always endeavoured to improve the army, and of which I have given so many proofs. On going out of the village I met a piquet of the first battalion of royal guards, with advanced sentinels, and arms ready to give fire, and a number of peasants in front. I was surprised at this novelty, and asked the officer what it meant? He answered, as did the sentinels when they came up, that he had orders not to let me pass. A colonel then came, to whom I stated my displeasure at being treated in this manner, which I considered as disgraceful. The peasants now broke out into strong expressions calculated to make an impression on the soldiers, for whom they knew I had made so many sacrifices. I, however, silenced them, ordering them to retire. I then proceeded to my house, sensibly feeling a treatment which I believe was never experienced in the Spanish armies by the most criminal subaltern officer. In a short time, the same battalion appeared in front of my house, and a guard was placed at the door of it. The people, indignant at an act of this kind, made loud lamentations, fearing something might be intended against my person. The sentiments of affection expressed by these good Spaniards, made a greater impression on me than this military apparatus, which I did not conceive to correspond to the dignity of my station, nor is it possible to believe that it was by your excellency’s orders.

“From this moment, I had sentinels placed upon me, and received orders from Brigadier Virues, to set out early in the morning for my destination, Ceuta, which I shall comply with, leaving the chief of the staff to deliver up the army, than which I think there is not a better in Europe, that has been organized, regulated, equipped, instructed, and disciplined, in only one fortnight. But I cannot but represent to your highness, that if my services have merited any attention, I could wish that the destination of Ceuta might be changed to the Province of Estremadura, and, if possible, to Fregenal or its vicinity, as I find my health much broken; and in that country, notwithstanding my misfortunes, I could maintain myself with respect, and my existence would not be burthensome to my country. This is the manner in which I have been treated with respect to my person, but I have felt still more sensibly the attack made on my reputation in the annexed paper, which Virues has published. He supposes in it, that I have distressed the people of Grenada by levying contributions, which I never thought of, but which, on the contrary, I always opposed; though I asked money of the intendant, which, however, he refused except as a loan, which I was to repay from the first funds I obtained.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. XII.

1812.

BOOK IX.

CHAP. XII.

1812.

"I shall proceed towards my destination; but if my indisposition increases, I shall halt at Coin, where your excellency may address to me your answer. God preserve your excellency many years.

"Grenada, Oct. 10. "F. BALLASTEROS."

The following is the paper alluded to:—

"Notice to the Public.—The regency of the kingdom has been pleased to discharge Senor Don Francisco Ballasteros from the command of general-in-chief of the fourth army, and the captaincy-general of the four Kingdoms of Andalusia, and to nominate in his stead, ad interim, Don Joaquin Virues, brigadier of the royal armies. In consequence, the contribution ordered by him is suspended till corresponding orders are received from government. The public, therefore, are not required to make the several payments assigned to them.

"VIRUES.

"Grenada, Oct. 30."

CHAPTER XIII.

Murder of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the House of Commons.—Apprehension of John Bellingham, the Assassin.—Consequent Proceedings.—Conduct of the Prisoner.—Life and Character of the Right Honorable Spencer Perceval.—Naval Affairs.

A MELANCHOLY affair happened at about a quarter-past five, Monday afternoon, May 11; which, for some days, interrupted the impending business of parliament. As the Right Honorable Spencer Perceval, chancellor of the exchequer, and first lord of the treasury, &c. &c. was entering the lobby of the house of commons, he was shot by a man who had placed himself for that purpose at the side of the door leading from the stone staircase. Mr. Perceval was in company with Lord F. Osborne, and immediately on receiving the ball, which entered the left breast, he staggered and fell at the feet of Mr. W. Smith, M. P. for Norwich, who was standing near the second pillar. The only words he uttered were—"Oh! I am murdered," and the latter was inarticulate, the sound dying between his lips. He was instantly taken up by Mr. Smith, who did not recognize him until he had looked in his face. The report of the pistol immediately drew great numbers to the spot, who assisted Mr. Smith in conveying the body of Mr. Perceval into the speaker's apartments, but before he reached them, all signs of life had departed. Mr. Perceval's corpse was placed upon a bed, and Mr. Lynn, of Great George-street, who had been sent for, arrived, but too late even to witness the last symptom of expiring existence. He found that the ball, which was of an unusually large size, had penetrated the heart near its centre, and had passed completely through it. From thence the body was removed to the speaker's drawing-room, by Mr. Lynn and several members, and it was laid on a sofa.

The horror and dismay occasioned by the assassination of Mr. Perceval, prevented any attention from being paid to other persons; and it was not until the right hon. gentleman was raised from the floor, that a person belonging to the vote-office exclaimed, "Where is the rascal that fired?" When a person, who had been unobserved, stepped up to him, and coolly replied, "I am the unfortunate man!" He did not make any attempt to escape, though he had concealed the pistol by which he had perpetrated the horrid deed, but resigned himself quietly into the hands of some of the bye-standers. They placed him upon a bench near the fire-place, where they kept him, and all the doors were closed, and the egress of any person prevented. When the assassin was interrogated as to his motive for this dreadful act, he replied, "My name is Bellingham: it is a private injury—I know what I have done—it was a denial of justice on the part of government." At this time the prisoner was in no legal custody, but was surrounded by many members, who insisted that he should be taken into the body of the house. The criminal was, however, previously searched, to which he made no resistance; and upon his person were found a steel pistol, loaded, about seven inches in length (nearly like that with which he had effected his fatal purpose, which had been secured) with a short screw barrel, and a bundle of papers folded like letters. The pistol with which the act was perpetrated was a small pocket-pistol, about six inches long, the barrel rather better than two inches in length, with the cock on the top, and a stop to the trigger. The calibre was nearly half an inch in diameter, and the barrel very strong. The pistol taken from his breeches-pocket was primed and loaded with one ball.

Two messengers then conveyed the prisoner to the bar of the house of commons, where the utmost confusion and anxiety prevailed. Members rushed from the house, strangers from the gallery, and adjacent parts, and peers from the lords, who all came to the spot, filled with the utmost horror and dismay at an event so truly alarming. Great confusion consequently ensued; numbers pressed round the spot where the prisoner was held in custody; and the expression of indignation was so great, that it almost appeared as if summary justice would have been done upon the offender. The speaker having taken the chair, was unable, for some minutes, to control the general disorder and agitation that prevailed. A number of peers were also in the house, among whom were Lord Liverpool, Lord Spencer, Lord Radnor, &c. Many individuals, who had witnessed part of this transaction, were mingled with members at the bar of the house, presenting a scene altogether new and extraordinary. Some degree of calm having been at length obtained, the speaker suggested to the house the propriety of having the prisoner immediately taken from the bar to the prison-room, and to prevent the confusion which might be apprehended if he were taken through the ordinary passage, that he might be conducted through the private passages and side stairs. This proposition meeting the ideas of the members present, he expressed his opinion that it would be better for a select number of members to precede and accompany the serjeant and the prisoner to the room in question, and there to take the examination of all persons who could give any information touching the circumstances of the case. The strangers in the lobby and in the house were desired not to depart until they had given their evidence. All the doors leading to Westminster-hall, and elsewhere, were ordered to be locked, and the egress and ingress of all persons prevented. Immediately after the prisoner was removed, the house adjourned, without proceeding in any other business, as, in fact, the sensation was too great to admit the possibility of further attention.

The prisoner having been conducted up-stairs to the prison-room, was stripped of his coat, waistcoat, and neckcloth, for the purpose of ascertaining whether any offensive weapon was concealed about his person; nothing of the kind, however, was found. By direction of the members he was then pinioned by a messenger, belonging to the house, on each side, in which position he was held during the whole course of the examination.

Mr. Alderman Combe, as a magistrate, was called to the chair, to take the depositions of the various witnesses in attendance, a duty in which he was shortly after aided by Mr. M. A. Taylor, also a magistrate.

Witnesses were then examined and bound over to give their evidence before the grand jury, and thereafter at the Old Bailey, against the prisoner "For the wilful murder of the Right Hon. Spencer Perceval," the members of parliament in the sum of 200*l.* recognizance; Mr. Burgess, also in 200*l.*; Mr. Jordan in 100*l.*; and the other persons in 50*l.* each.

The examinations having been brought to a conclusion, the prisoner was asked what he had to say against the fact with which he was charged, and cautioned by Sir. J. C. Hippisley not to say any thing that would be injurious to himself. He spoke to the following effect: "I have admitted the fact—I admit the fact, but wish, with permission, to state something in my justification. I have been denied the redress of my grievances by government; I have been ill-treated. They all know who I am, and what I am, through the secretary of state and Mr. Becket, with whom I have had frequent communications. They knew of this fact six weeks ago, through the magistrates of Bow-street. I was accused most wrongfully by a governor-general in Russia, in a letter from Archangel to Riga, and have sought redress in vain. I am a most unfortunate man, and feel here (placing his hand on his breast) sufficient justification for what I have done."

Here Lord Castlereagh interfered, and informed the prisoner that he was not then called on for his defence, but merely to say what he had to urge in contradiction to the fact with which he was charged. Any thing he might feel desirous of stating in extenuation of his crime, he had better reserve for his trial.

The prisoner said, "Since it seems best to you that I should not now explain the causes of my conduct, I will leave it until the day of my trial, when my country will have an opportunity of judging whether I am right or wrong."

Upon being again questioned, he repeated, "I admit the fact;" which admission was accordingly entered upon the record. The Bow-street officers were called in, and the prisoner having been permitted to dress, was handcuffed. He applied for his money, which having been left in the possession of Mr. Burgess, who had withdrawn, Mr. Whitbread assured him he should have it returned to him in the morning. He also asked whether he should be allowed an attorney and counsel? when Mr. Whitbread signified to him that Mr. Combe would take care that every necessary indulgence should be allowed him, consistent with his situation. In no part of the proceeding did he betray extreme agitation; but, at the moment that one of the witnesses said, "I supported Mr. Perceval into the secretary's room, and in a few minutes he died in my arms," the prisoner shed tears, and seemed much affected.

After the examination, he was reconducted to the prison-room, where he found much fault with the officer, for having inquired from some female something relative to his private affairs. He calmly said, he knew the consequence of the act he had committed, which he did not consider of a private nature. On the officer's answering, that he had only spoken in general terms to the female, and she told him she had in her possession a memorandum of 20*l.* due by a Mr. Wilson to him; the prisoner, in a most unconcerned manner, replied, he knew what it was; it was a bill that he expected would have been paid next day, at half-past nine o'clock. He did not talk at all incoherently, except on the subject of assassination: respecting that deed, he said, that he expected to be brought before a tribunal where ample justice would be done to him; and that he expected to be liberated, and ultimately to have his claims satisfied.

BOOK IX.

CH. XIII.

1812.

He was conveyed to the secretary of state's office for the home department, where he was placed in a room, in which he walked nearly the whole time.

On the breaking up of the council, he was sent to Newgate. His commitment was signed by Michael Angelo Taylor, Esq. M. P. who accompanied him in the coach to Newgate, where he was doubly ironed.

The body of Mr. Perceval was removed from the speaker's house the same night, to his own in Downing-street; and the next morning, at 11 o'clock, a most respectable jury was summoned to attend A. Gell, Esq. coroner for Westminster, at the sign of the Rose and Crown, in Downing-street. After taking a view of the body, and examining witnesses, a verdict of wilful murder was found against John Bellingham, alias Bellingham.

In the mean time, the Earl of Radnor, after a few words in the house of lords, moved an address to his royal highness the prince-regent, on the melancholy and afflicting occasion, the purport of which was, to express the feeling of regret and abhorrence entertained by the house at the melancholy circumstance attending the death of the Right Hon. Spencer Perceval, one of his majesty's most honourable privy-council: requesting that information might be laid before the house respecting the same; and praying that measures might be taken by his royal highness for bringing the offender or offenders to condign and exemplary punishment.

The address being unanimously voted; it was ordered to be presented forthwith, by a committee of lords specially appointed. On the following day (May 12) the Duke of York rose, and stated, that he had in his hand the answer of the prince-regent to the address of the house, respecting the assassination of Mr. Perceval, which, with their lordship's permission, he would deliver at the table.

The answer was given in and read by the clerk. It contained only a few words, which were merely an echo to the address,—“That his royal highness the prince-regent participated in the sentiments of horror felt by their lordships at the atrocious murder of Mr. Perceval, and would take the requisite measures to bring the perpetrator to justice.”

The bill of indictment against Bellingham was found, May 14, at the Sessions-house, Clerkenwell. His trial came on the next morning (Friday) at the Old Bailey, and the court was crowded to an excess.—The counsel retained for the crown were the attorney-general, Messrs. Garrow, Knapp, Gurney, and Abbott.—For the prisoner, Messrs. Alley and Reynolds. So great was the press, that a number of eminent persons of both houses of parliament were compelled to intermix indiscriminately with the multitude in the body of the court and the ordinary galleries.

When the prisoner was called upon to plead, his counsel stated, that he had no right, being insane. Two affidavits were read to that effect; and application was made to put off the trial; but the attorney-general contended, that this was a contrivance merely to impose on the court and prevent justice. He put it to the court, that the prisoner had been four months in town, transacting every species of business, and he did not call any of those to shew, that he was in that deranged state of mind they would describe.

The court then consulted for a short time, and Sir James Mansfield pronounced judgment of the court respecting the application, and said, that the affidavits were not sufficient to induce them to put off the trial.

He was then arraigned, and Mr. Abbott opened the pleadings.

The attorney-general, in his address to the jury, noticed the manner in which the prisoner conducted himself, to shew that he was always compos mentis, and completely so at the time he committed the foul murder.

The assassination of Mr. Perceval having been proved by several witnesses, the prisoner was called upon for his defence; when, at his request, the papers taken from his person were delivered to him, and he proceeded to address the jury in a speech of above an hour's continuance, interspersed with the reading of those several documents and with his own comments. He expressed his thanks to the king's attorney-general for the resistance he opposed to the defence set up by his counsel, which went to prove that he was insane; because, if it had succeeded, it would not have answered the purpose of his justification. As to the lamentable catastrophe for which he was now on his trial before that court, no man could lament the sad event with deeper sorrow than he did—not even the family and nearest friends of the unfortunate Mr. Perceval. He disclaimed, in the most solemn manner, any motive of personal or premeditated malice towards that gentleman in particular; and could only state, the unfortunate lot had fallen upon him as a leading member of that administration, which had repeatedly refused him any reparation for the unparalleled injuries he had sustained in Russia. He then entered into a detail of the injuries he had suffered. He was, he said, a person engaged in mercantile concerns at Liverpool, and in a prosperous situation; that in the year 1804 he went to Russia, on some mercantile business of importance to himself; and having finished that business he was about to take his departure from Archangel for England. At that time a ship, called the Soleure, was lost in the White Sea. She was chartered for England, and, by the direction of her owners, insured at Lloyd's coffee-house; but the underwriters at Lloyd's refused to pay the owners for their loss; and in consequence of some circumstances connected with this refusal, and the loss of this ship, with neither of which he had any concern whatever, he was seized in his carriage as he was passing the Russian frontier, by order of the military governor at Archangel, and thrown into prison.—He immediately applied to the British consul at Archangel, and through him to the British ambassador, Lord Granville Leveson Gower, then at the Russian court, stating his case. Lord G. L. Gower wrote to the military governor of Archangel, desiring, that if he, the prisoner, was not detained for any legal cause, he might be immediately liberated as a British subject; but the governor answered, that he, the prisoner, was detained in prison for a legal cause, and that he had conducted himself in a very indecorous manner. From this time Lord G. L. Gower, and the British consul, positively declined any farther interference in the business; and he, the prisoner, was detained in durance for near two years, in spite of all his endeavours to induce the British minister to interfere with the Emperor of Russia, for the investigation of his case. At length, however, after being bandied from prison to prison and from dungeon to dungeon, fed on bread and water, treated with the utmost cruelty, and frequently marched through the streets under a military guard, with felons and criminals of the most atrocious description, even before the residence of the British minister, who might view from his window this degrading severity towards a British subject who had committed no crime, to the disgrace and insult of the British nation; he was afterwards enabled to make his case known through the procureur; it was investigated, and he obtained a judgment against the military governor and the senate. Notwithstanding this decision, he was immediately sent to another prison, and a demand was made on him for 2,000 roubles, alleged to be due by him to a Russian merchant, who was a bankrupt. He refused to pay this demand for a debt which he did not owe; and the senate, finding him determined to resist the demand, he was declared a bankrupt, and continued in prison under the pretence, that having been applied to for the payment of this demand, he had made answer that he could not pay it, because all his property was in England, no such answer having ever been given by him. Under this pretence he was detained in prison. When the Marquis of Douglas arrived in Russia, he made his case known to him; and said he only wished it to be shewn, that the money was justly due, and he would pay it. The Marquis of Douglas made a representation, and stated, it was only desired, that the justice of the claim should be shewn, and the money should be paid. This application, however, was ineffectual, and he was still required to pay the 2,000 roubles, or even 20 roubles, to acknowledge, in some degree, the justice of the demand. All this while his wife, a young woman of only twenty years of age, with an infant at her breast, remained at St. Petersburg, in expectation of his arrival; and at length, in the eighth month of her pregnancy, disappointed of her hopes, was obliged to set out, unprotected, on her voyage for England. At last, after a series of six years persecution in the manner he had described, the senate, quite tired out by these severities, in 1809 he received, at midnight, a discharge from his confinement, and an order to quit the Russian dominions; with a pass, which was in fact an acknowledgment of the justice of his cause.

On his return to England he laid a statement of his grievances before the Marquis Wellesley, accompanied by authentic documents, and claiming some redress for the injuries he had sustained through the conduct of the British minister in Russia; which injuries it was impossible he should have suffered, if they had not been countenanced and sanctioned by that minister. The noble marquis was then in court, and could contradict his statement if it was false. He represented the circumstances as they really were; and not as personally concerning himself, but as involving the honor of the British government. He was referred by the noble marquis to the privy-council, and from the privy-council to the treasury; and thus bandied from one department to another, he applied to Mr. Perceval, who refused to support his claims. He was next advised to petition parliament; but then he was informed it was necessary to have the sanction of his majesty's ministers, as his claim was of a pecuniary nature; and he accordingly wrote to Mr. Perceval during the session of 1811, but he received for answer from his secretary, that the time for presenting 1812.

BOOK IX.

CH. XIII.

BOOK IX.

CH. XIII.

1812.

private petitions to parliament was gone by, and that Mr. Perceval could not encourage his hopes, that he would recommend his claims to the house of commons. He next memorialised his royal highness the prince-regent, in a statement of his sufferings; some time afterwards, he received an answer from Colonel M'Mahon, stating, that by some accident his petition was mislaid. He then wrote another petition to his royal highness, and he understood it was referred to the treasury, as appeared by a letter to him from Mr. Secretary Ryder, dated Whitehall, on the very day his royal highness came to unrestricted power; but at the treasury he was afterwards told that nothing could be done, and that he had nothing to expect. He wrote another memorial to the prince-regent, but was informed by a letter from Mr. Ryder, that his royal highness had not been pleased to give any commands on the subject. Foiled in all his attempts to obtain justice, he applied, about six weeks since, to the magistrates at Bow-street, in a letter, stating his grievances, 'intreating their interference by application to government', and adding, that if all redress was refused him, he must be obliged to do himself justice by taking such steps as those must be responsible for who resisted all his applications. He received an answer in few lines from Mr. Justice Read, saying, that the office could not interfere: but he found that Mr. Read, as was his duty, had represented the circumstance to government; and on a subsequent application to the treasury, he was informed there, that he had nothing to expect, and that he was at liberty to take such steps as he thought fit. Finding himself thus bereft of all hopes of redress; his affairs ruined by his long imprisonment in Russia, through the fault of the British minister; his property all dispersed for want of his own attention; his family driven into tribulation and want; his wife and children claiming support, which he was unable to give them; himself involved in difficulties, and pressed on all sides by claims he could not answer; and that justice refused to him which it was the duty of government to give, not as a matter of favor but of right; and Mr. Perceval obstinately refusing to sanction his claims in parliament, he was driven to despair, and under these agonizing feelings was impelled to that desperate alternative which he had unfortunately adopted, and for which the last answer of the government had given him a carte blanche.

Lord G. L. Gower was then in the court, and he called on him to contradict, if he could, the statement he had made. Mr. Perceval had unfortunately fallen the victim of his desperate resolution. No man lamented more sincerely than he did the calamitous event. He could never reflect on it without being ready to burst into tears.

3.

If he had met Lord Gower, in the desperate resolution he had taken, he (Lord G.) should have received the ball—and not Mr. Perceval. He disclaimed most solemnly all personal or premeditated malice against Mr. Perceval.

In the conclusion of his address, Bellingham became very animated and energetic:

"It is a melancholy fact," said he, "that the warping of justice, including all the various ramifications in which it operates, occasions more misery in the world, in a moral sense, than all the acts of God in a physical one, with which he punishes mankind for their transgressions; a confirmation of which, the single, but strong instance before you, is one remarkable proof."

"If a poor unfortunate man stops another upon the highway, and robs him of but a few shillings, he may be called upon to forfeit his life. But I have been robbed of my liberty for years, ill-treated beyond precedent, torn from my wife and family, bereaved of all my property to make good the consequences of such irregularities; deprived and bereaved of every thing that makes life valuable, and then called upon to forfeit it, because Mr. Perceval has been pleased to patronize iniquity that ought to have been punished, for the sake of a vote or two in the house of commons, with, perhaps, a similar good turn elsewhere."

"Is there, gentlemen, any comparison between the enormity of these two offenders? No more than a mite to a mountain. Yet the one is carried to the gallows, while the other stalks in security, fancying himself beyond the reach of law or justice: the most honest man suffers, while the other goes forward in triumph to new and more extended enormities."

"Every man within the sound of my voice must feel for my situation; but by you, gentlemen of the jury, it must be felt in a peculiar degree, who are husbands and fathers, and can fancy yourselves in my situation. I trust that this serious lesson will operate as a warning to all future ministers, and lead them to do the thing that is right, as an unerring rule of conduct; for, if the superior classes were more correct in their proceedings, the extensive ramifications of evil would, in a great measure, be hemmed up—and a notable proof of the fact is, that this court would never have been troubled with the case before it, had their conduct been guided by these principles."

"I have now occupied the attention of the court for a period much longer than I intended; yet, I trust, they will consider the awfulness of my situation to be a sufficient ground for a trespass, which, under other circumstances, would be inexcusable. Sooner than suffer what I have suffered for the last eight years, I should, however, consider 500 deaths, if it were possible for human nature to endure them, a fate far more preferable."

Lost so long to all the endearments of my family, bereaved of all the blessings of life, and deprived of its greatest sweet, liberty; as the weary traveller, who has long been pelted by the pitiless storm, welcomes the much-desired inn, I shall receive death as the relief of all my sorrows. I shall not occupy your attention longer, but relying on the justice of God, and submitting myself to the dictates of your conscience, I submit to the fiat of my fate, firmly anticipating an acquittal from a charge so abhorrent to every feeling of my soul."

Three witnesses were called to prove the prisoner insane, his father having died in a state of insanity. Sir James Mansfield then succinctly recapitulated the circumstances, and remarked, that the plea of insanity could not be of any avail in such a case, unless it could be proved that the prisoner, at the time he committed the act, was so far deranged in his mind, as not to be capable of judging between right and wrong.

The Jury, after retiring a short time, returned their verdict—Guilty. And the recorder, after a solemn and impressive address, pronounced the awful sentence.

On the morning appointed for Bellingham's execution, May 17, at seven o'clock, about twenty gentlemen, chiefly men of rank, assembled in the lord-mayor's parlour at the sessions-house. In about half-an-hour the lord-mayor and sheriffs arrived in full dress suits of black. It rained hard. When the prisoner appeared, he looked about him with a quick and sharp manner, and observed, "It is a very wet morning." He seemed as calm, collected, and firm, as any of the spectators, quite attentive to what was going forward without the least confusion. He was dressed in a brown great-coat, buttoned half way up; a blue-and-buff striped waistcoat, clay-coloured pantaloons, white stockings, and shoes. He kept on his round hat, and looked a little flushed in the face.

He did not struggle at first, and but very little afterwards. It was asserted in a morning paper, that after his body was opened, his heart continued to perform its functions, or in other words, to be alive for four hours after he was laid open. He was a tall, large-boned man, about forty years of age, with a thin, long visage, and aquiline nose.

A handsome provision was made by parliament for Mrs. Perceval and her children, immediately after this extraordinary assassination. The Right Honorable Spencer Perceval was descended from a very ancient family. He was second son of the Earl of Egremont, of the kingdom of Ireland, and Baron Lovel and Holland in England, by Catharine Compton, (this lady, on the 19th of May, 1770, was created a peeress of Ireland, by the style of Lady Arden, Baroness Arden, of Lohart Castle, in the county of Cork, &c. to herself, and her heirs male; and who was succeeded by her eldest son, who, in 1802, was created a peer of England,) sister to Lord Northampton, was born at his father's house in Audley-square, November 1, 1762. He was named after his uncle Spencer, Earl of Northampton, and was brought up at Charlton in Kent, where his father had a house. At a proper age he was removed to Harrow school, whence he repaired to Trinity College, Cambridge. He obtained the degree of M. A. which shortened the road to the bar, for thither he was hastening, having been entered of Lincoln's Inn, of which he was then a bencher. He commenced his career by accompanying the judges through the midland circuit. On this circuit he was opposed to Mr. Serjeant Vaughan, and first distinguished himself on the trial of George Thomas, of Brackley, in Northamptonshire, for forgery, against whom he was retained as counsel. Mr. Law, now chief-justice, was on the other side. At this period he had chambers in Lincoln's Inn, together with a house in Bedford-street, opposite Bedford-row, whence his family removed to Hampstead. His practice was never very extensive in Westminster Hall, though great on the circuit. He began in the King's Bench, and then removed to the Court of Chancery. He was, however, considered as a rising man, and this was soon rendered evident, for he was appointed counsel to the Admiralty, and in 1799 he obtained a silk gown, but without a patent of precedence. His own university also paid him a high compliment, by his nomination as one of its two counsel.

From this period, his professional preferments were rapid, for in 1801 he succeeded Sir William Grant as solicitor, and in 1802 became attorney-general, in the place of Sir Edward Law, (Lord Ellenborough;) the latter office he held until Mr. Fox and Lord Grenville came into power in 1806.

Mr. Perceval had paid, (August 10, 1790) his homage at the shrine of wedlock, with Miss Jane Wilson, the youngest daughter of Sir Thomas Spencer Wilson, of Charlton, in the county of Kent. (His brother, Lord Arden, in 1787 married Margaret Elizabeth Wilson, the elder daughter.) With this lady he had got acquainted early in life, by the country-seats of the two families happening to be in the same parish.

Meanwhile Mr. Perceval, partly propelled by his own ambition, and partly by the spirit of his original destination, had determined on a public parliamentary life. His first acquaintance, at least that intimacy between himself and Mr. Pitt which laid the basis of his advancement in the state, commenced from the circumstance of Mr. Perceval's publishing a pamphlet, which had for its object to prove, "That an impeachment by

BOOK IX.

Ch. XIII.

1812.

BOOK IX. the house of commons did not abate by a dissolution of parliament." It is said, that when Mr. Pitt became intimate with him, he prognosticated warmly of his future success: declaring, that his talents, stability of character, conduct, and promptitude, were such, as to qualify him for the leading situations in government.

Ca. XIII.
1812.

At length an event occurred, in consequence of which he himself had an opportunity of entering the political arena, and exhibiting his prowess in St. Stephen's chapel. In consequence of the demise of his maternal uncle, April 7, 1796, a vacancy for the representation of the borough of Northampton took place, as his first cousin, Lord Compton, by succeeding to the earldom, of course vacated his seat.

Mr. Perceval gave a brilliant example of his talents on his first entrance into the house of commons. His figure was, indeed, far from commanding, and his delivery wanted dignity. He spoke, however, with great ease and grace; and his clear and musical voice, joined to the benevolent softness and unaffected placidity of his manners, made a deep impression on the house. No man was heard with more favor; because no man was ever treated by him but with kindness and civility. His first speech was on the assessed tax-bill. He was well attended to by the house, and followed by Mr. Sheridan, who commented on, and answered several of the arguments; observing, at the same time, "that this was a speech of great talent, great ingenuity, and considerable force!"

From this period, Mr. Perceval paid a particular attention to matters of finance. He observed, in reply to some observations on the part of Mr. Tierney, "that tricking in love, and tricking the public, were both, in his opinion, unquestionably immoral."

Soon after, the subject of this memoir attained the first grand step in his profession, having been appointed solicitor-general at the age of thirty-nine. In 1802, he became attorney-general.—When Mr. Perceval was appointed solicitor-general, he went into the court of chancery, where his practice soon became considerable. He was principally opposed to Sir Samuel Romilly; and though he was inferior as a practical-lawyer, he excelled him greatly as a speaker, and made the best stand that was ever made against that popular advocate in the chancery-court. Mr. Pitt, when he again assumed the reins of power, continued Mr. Perceval in his office. In consequence of a second coalition, to the full as singular as the first, Mr. Fox and Lord Grenville, by the death of Mr. Pitt, found themselves in possession of power. This administration, however, was not of long duration, for it continued only during a year, a week, and a day; at the expiration of which period Mr. Perceval obtained a seat in the cabinet, and the office of chancellor of the exchequer; which office he held till the death of the Duke of Portland, in 1809, when he was appointed to succeed him as first lord of the treasury, and prime minister of the country. He was in the fiftieth year of his age when he was assassinated, his lady being then pregnant with her twentieth child.

The Right Hon. N. Vansittart succeeded Mr. Perceval as chancellor of the exchequer.

Several captures of French privateers were made this year; and some brilliant actions were fought by the British navy, as usual. The Ame-thyst frigate, of forty guns, having on board 400 men, and 300 troops, was captured by the Southampton, of thirty-two guns, Captain Sir J. Yeo, after an action of two hours: the former had 300 men killed (including the French captain) and wounded; the latter, only twelve men killed and wounded.

The Victorious, Captain Talbot, attacked a squadron in the Adriatic, and after a most gallant action (April 16), captured the Rivoli, a new 80-gun ship, and 862 men. The Victorious had only 506 men, sixty of whom were in the sick-list. The action was long and severe.

L'Arianne and L'Andromache, of 44 guns, and 450 men each, and the Mameluke brig, of 18 guns, and 150 men, were totally destroyed by the Northumberland, Captain Hotham, on the 22d of May.

The destruction of the French national store-ship, La Dorade, of 14 guns, and eighty-six men, was accomplished by the Hon. Captain Bouverie, of the Medusa. The ship was carried, after a desperate struggle: the whole of her crew, except twenty-three taken, being killed or drowned. The Medusa had none killed, and only five wounded.

Sir James Saumarez, in the Dictator, with the Podargus, Calypso, and Flamer gun-brig, attacked the Danish force, far superior in numbers, on the 6th and 7th of July, and took the Nayaden, of 48 guns, and 335 men; Laaland, of 20 guns, and 120 men; Samsøe, of 18 guns, and 120 men; and Kiel, of 18 guns, and 120 men. The Nayaden, Laaden, and Samsøe, were abandoned, being complete wrecks. Several gun-boats were sunk.

The privateer La Ville de Caen, was, after an action of an hour and a half, boarded in a most spirited manner, and taken by his majesty's schooner Sealark, Lieutenant Thomas Warraud.

Le Courier was taken by Captain Harper, of the Saracen sloop. The French captain, M. Juan, and two of the crew, were desperately wounded, before they surrendered. Other vessels, belonging to the French, were captured; and very few of the British lost: indeed, the latter suffered more by storms at this period than by the enemy.

BOOK X.

CHAPTER I.

Events which led to Hostilities between Russia and France.—Mutual Preparations for War.—Commencement of Hostilities.

TOWARDS the close of the year 1810, Russia altered her political system. Her ukase of December 19 destroyed the commercial relations of France with that empire, and admitted English commerce, contrary to treaty, into her ports; her armings, which commenced in 1811, threatened the invasion of the duchy of Warsaw; and, finally, the protest respecting Oldenburg annihilated the treaty of alliance between France and Russia. It no longer existed when on both sides armies were forming for reciprocal observation. The whole of the last mentioned year was spent by France in conference and negotiation with Russia, in the hope of withdrawing, if possible, the cabinet of Petersburg from the war, upon which it appeared to be resolved, and to obtain a knowledge of its real intentions. It was proved to the certainty of evidence, that that power proposed at the same time to depart from the conditions of the treaty of Tilsit, to place herself in peace with England, and to menace the existence of the duchy of Warsaw, making use of the pretexts of indemnities claimed for the Duke of Oldenburg.

In February, 1811, five divisions of the Russian army quitted the Danube by forced marches, and proceeded to Poland. By this movement Russia sacrificed Moldavia and Wallachia. When the Russian armies were united and formed, a protest against France appeared, which was transmitted to every cabinet. Russia by that announced, that she felt no wish even to save appearances; and all means of conciliation employed on the part of France were ineffectual.

Towards the close of that year, six months after it was manifest in France that all this could end only in war, preparations were made for it, and the consequent divisions of the French armies were, of course, more favorable to the Spanish cause. The garrison of Dantzic was increased to 20,000 men. Stores of every description were conveyed to that place; and considerable sums of money were placed at the disposal of the department of engineers, for the augmentation of its fortifications. The French army was placed on the war establishment. The cavalry, the train artillery, and the military baggage train, were completed. In March, 1812, a treaty of alliance was concluded between France and Austria, by which the latter was to furnish 30,000 men; the preceding month a treaty had been concluded between France and Prussia.

The following ukase was published by the Russian government at this time:—

“By the grace of God, we, Alexander the first, emperor and autocrat of all the Russias, &c.

“The present situation of Europe requires the adoption of firm and strong measures, as well as indefatigable vigilance and energetic exertions, so as to fortify our extensive empire, in the most formidable way possible, against all hostile enterprize. Our bold and courageous Russian nation has been accustomed to live in peace and harmony with all the surrounding nations; but, when storms have threatened our empire, patriots, of all ranks and stations, were ready to draw the sword for the defence of their religion and laws.

“Now there appears to be the most urgent necessity to increase the number of our troops by a new levy. Our strong forces are already at their posts, for the defence of the empire; their bravery and courage are known to all the world. The confidence of their emperor and government is with them. Their faith and love to their country will make them irresistible against a far superior force. With the same paternal care have we adopted all defensive measures to secure the safety and welfare of all and every one; and therefore order, 1st, To raise in the whole empire, from each 500 men, two recruits; 2dly, To commence in all our governments two weeks after the receipt of the ukase, and to be finished in the course of a month; 3dly, To conform to the regulations laid down, with respect to the levy of recruits, by an ukase presented to the senate, and

BOOK X.

CHAP. I.

1812.

BOOK X. dated September 16, 1811; 4thly, The recruits to be kept in the garrison towns, with the garrison and interior battalions, on the same footing as the recruits for provisionary depôts are kept and brought up.

CHAP. I.
1812.

"The immediate fulfilment of this order, for raising of recruits during the period fixed, is entrusted to the senate.

"ALEXANDER.

"St. Petersburg, March 23, 1812."

Several applications had, at this period, been made to the Emperor Alexander, by the French government, to give Bonaparte an interview, which the former very wisely declined.

In April, the first corps of the French grand army marched for the Oder; the second corps to the Elbe; the third corps to the Lower Oder; the fourth corps set out from Verona, crossed the Tyrol, and proceeded to Silesia. The guards left Paris. On the 22d of April, the Emperor of Russia took the command of his army, quitted St. Petersburg, and moved his head-quarters to Wilna. On quitting St. Petersburg, the Emperor Alexander was hailed by the acclamations of the inhabitants of his capital. War with France was by no means unpopular in Russia, for it was generally looked upon as inevitable.

Some days before the emperor's departure, Lauriston endeavoured to detain him, pretending that the French troops had advanced towards the Russian frontiers without orders from Bonaparte; and adding, that with the permission of his imperial majesty, he would send one of his aides-de-camp to direct them to countermarch. The answer of Alexander was, that the French marshals were not in the habit of acting without orders; that he (Lauriston) might act as he thought proper,—but his own resolution was irreversibly taken. It is supposed that this answer decided the departure of Bonaparte from Paris.

In the commencement of May, the first corps arrived on the Vistula; at Elbing and Marienburg; the second corps at Marienwerder, the third corps at Thorn, the fourth and sixth corps at Plock, the fifth corps assembled at Warsaw, the eighth corps on the right of Warsaw, and the seventh corps at Pulawy. The French emperor set out from St. Cloud on the 9th of May; crossed the Rhine on the 13th, the Elbe on the 29th, and the Vistula on the 16th of June.

All the means of effecting an understanding between the two empires became impossible. General Narbonne, aid-de-camp to the French emperor, was dispatched to Wilna, and could remain there only a few days. By that was gained the proof, that the demand which had been made by Prince Kurakin, and in which he declared, that he would not enter into any explanation before France had evacuated the territory of her own allies, in order to leave them at the mercy of Russia, was the sine qua non of that cabinet.

The first corps advanced to the Pregel. The Prince of Eckmühl had his head-quarters, on the 11th of June, at Königsberg.

The Marshal Duke of Reggio, commanding the second corps, had his head-quarters at Wehlau; the Marshal Duke of Elchingen, commanding the third corps, at Soldass; the prince Viceroy, at Rastenberg; the King of Westphalia, at Warsaw; the Prince Poniatowski, at Pultusk. The French emperor moved his head-quarters, on the 12th, to Königsberg, on the Pregel; on the 17th to Insterburg; and on the 19th to Gumbinnen.

A slight hope of accommodation still remained. The emperor had given orders to Count Lauriston to wait on the Emperor Alexander, or on his minister for foreign affairs, and to ascertain whether there might not yet be some means of obtaining a reconsideration of the demand of Prince Kurakin, and of reconciling the honor of France, and the interest of her allies, with the opening of a negotiation.

The same spirit which had previously swayed the Russian cabinet upon various pretexts, prevented Count Lauriston from accomplishing his mission; and it appeared, for the first time, that an ambassador, under circumstances of so much importance, was unable to obtain an interview, either with the sovereign or his minister. The secretary of legation, Prevost, carried this intelligence to Gumbinnen; and the emperor issued orders to march, for the purpose of passing the Niemen. Napoleon then caused a proclamation to the soldiers to be inserted in the orders of the army; in which it is said, "At Tilsit, Russia swore eternal alliance with France, and war with England. She now violates her oaths. She refuses to give any explanation of her strange conduct, until the eagles of France shall have repassed the Rhine, leaving, by such a movement, our allies at her mercy."

On the 23d of June, the King of Naples, who commanded the cavalry, transferred his head-quarters to within two leagues of the Niemen, upon its left bank. The marshal Prince of Eckmühl, commanding the first corps, moved his head-quarters to the skirts of the great forest of Pilwisky. The second corps, and the imperial guards, followed the line of march of the first corps. The third corps took the direction of Marienpol; the viceroy, with the fourth and sixth corps, which remained in the rear, marched upon Kalvary. The King of Westphalia proceeded to Novogorod, with the fifth, seventh, and eighth corps. The first Austrian corps, commanded by the Prince of Schwarzenberg, quitted Lemberg, made a movement on its left, and drew near to Lublin. The pontoon train, under the orders of General Eble, arrived on the 23d within two leagues of the Niemen. On the 23d, at two in the morning, the French emperor arrived at the advanced-posts near Kowno, took a Polish cloak and cap from one of the light cavalry, and inspected the banks of the Niemen, accompanied by General Haxo, of the engineers, alone. On the 24th, he proceeded to Kowno.

At this period the Emperor of Russia was at Wilna, where he had been for sometime with part of his court and guards, and one part of his army occupied Ronikontoni and Novtroki. The Russian General Bagawout, commanding the second corps, and a part of the Russian army, having been cut off from Wilna, had no other means of safety than by proceeding towards the Dwina. Several Cossack officers, and officers charged with dispatches, were captured by the French light cavalry.

The Niemen, it should be observed, is navigable for vessels of two or three hundred tons, as far as Kowno. The communications by water are also secured as far as Dantzic, and with the Vistula, the Oder, and the Elbe. The Wilia, which flows by Wilna, is navigable for very small boats from Kowno to Wilna. Wilna, the capital of Lithuania, is also the chief town of all Polish Russia. Wilna contains from 25 to 30,000 inhabitants, with a great number of convents and fine public buildings. About twenty-four hours after the Russians received intelligence that the French had passed the river at Kowno, the Russian court left the place.

The following were the general orders of his Russian imperial majesty to the armies, given at Wilna, June 13 (o. s.) 25.

"For a long time past we had remarked the hostile comportment of the French emperor towards Russia; but we still hoped, through moderate and pacific measures, to avert hostilities. —At last, notwithstanding all our wishes to maintain peace, we witnessed an incessant repetition of open outrages, which compelled us to arm, and to assemble our troops; though still, while we could flatter ourselves with the hope of reconciliation, we remained within the confines of our empire; and without violating peace, were prepared for defence. All these moderate and pacific measures could not secure to us the tranquillity of which we were desirous. The French emperor, by an attack upon our troops at Kowno, has already commenced war; and consequently nothing farther remains for us, but, while we invoke the aid of the sovereign of the universe, the author and defender of truth, to place our force in opposition to the force of the enemy. It is unnecessary to remind our generals, our chiefs, and warriors, of their duty, and of their valour. In their veins flows the blood of the Sclavonians, so highly renowned of old for their victories. Soldiers! You are the defenders of religion, your country, and independence.

"I am with you. God is on your side.

"ALEXANDER."

BOOK X.

CHAP. I.

1812.

On the 27th the French emperor arrived at the advanced-posts, and put the army in motion for the purpose of approaching Wilna, and attacking the Russian army at day-break of the 28th, should it wish to defend Wilna, or retard its capture, in order to save the immense magazines which it had there. One Russian division occupied Troki, and another division was on the heights of Traka. At this time the Emperor Alexander issued the following proclamation to his subjects:

"The French troops have passed the borders of our empire—a complete treacherous attack is the reward of the observance of our alliance. For the preservation of peace I have exhausted every possible means consistently with the honor of my throne and the advantage of my people. All my endeavours have been in vain. The Emperor Napoleon has fully resolved in his own mind to ruin Russia. The most moderate proposals on our parts have remained without an answer. This sudden surprise has shewn, in an unequivocal manner, the groundlessness of his pacific promises, which he lately repeated—There therefore remain no further steps for me to take, but to have recourse to arms, and to employ all the means that have been granted me by providence to use force against force. I place full confidence in the zeal of my people, and on the bravery of my troops. As they are threatened in the middle of their families, they will defend them with their national bravery and energy. Providence will crown with success our just cause. The defence of our native country, the maintenance of our independence and national honor, have compelled us to have recourse to arms. I will not sheath my sword so long as there is a single enemy within my imperial borders.

(Signed)

"ALEXANDER."

At day-break of the 28th, the King of Naples put himself in motion with the advanced-guard, and the light cavalry of General Count Bruyeres. The marshal Prince of Eckmuhl supported him with his corps. The Russians every where retired. After exchanging some cannon-shot, they crossed the Wilia in haste, burned the wooden bridge of Wilna, and set fire to immense magazines, valued at many millions of rubles; more than 150,000 quintals of flour, an immense supply of forage and oats, and a great mass of articles of clothing, were burned. A great quantity of arms and warlike stores was destroyed and thrown into the Wilia. At mid-day the French emperor entered Wilna. In the afternoon the bridge over the Wilia was re-established, and another constructed.

BOOK X.

CHAP. I.

1812.

The division of Bruyeres followed the enemy by the left bank. In a slight affair with their rear, about eighty carriages were taken from the Russians. The Polish light-horse of the guard made a charge on the right bank of the Wilia, put to rout, pursued, and made prisoners, a considerable number of Cossacks.

On the 25th, the Duke of Reggio crossed the Wilia; and next day he marched upon Javou, and on the 27th on Chatoui. This movement obliged the Prince of Wittgenstein, commandant of the first corps of the Russian army, to evacuate all Samogitia, and the country lying between Kowno and the sea; and to retire upon Wilkomir, after obtaining a reinforcement of two regiments of the guards.

On the 28th a rencounter took place opposite Develtovo. The Russians were driven from one position to another; and passed the bridge with so much precipitation, that they could not set fire to it. The Russians lost 300 prisoners, among whom were several officers, and about 100 killed or wounded. The French loss amounted to about fifty men, as they said.

The Russians then set fire to their grand magazine at Wilkomir; but a part of it fell into the hands of the French.

Hitherto the campaign had not been sanguinary; and in all the skirmishes the French did not make above 1,000 prisoners. But the Russians lost the capital and the greater part of the Polish provinces. All the magazines of the first, second, and third lines, the result of two years care, and valued at more than 20,000,000 of rubles, were consumed by the flames, except that part which fell into the power of the French. In short, the head-quarters of the French army were now in the place where the Russian court had fixed its residence for six weeks.

In consequence of the destruction of the triple line of magazines, the Emperor Alexander gave orders for the speedy establishment of magazines at Witepsk, Ostrow, Weliki-Louke, and Pskoff.

The Russian army was still posted and organized in a very advantageous manner. The first corps, commanded by Prince Wittgenstein, consisted of 18,000 men, including artillery and sappers. The second corps, commanded by General Bagawout, consisted of the same numerical force. The third corps, commanded by General Schomaloff, amounted to 24,000 men. The fourth corps, commanded by General Tutschkoff, consisted of 18,000 men. The imperial guards were at Wilna. The sixth corps, commanded by General Doctorow, consisted of 18,000 men; this corps afterwards formed a part of the army of Prince Bagration. The fifth corps was commanded by Prince Bagration, and amounted to 40,000 men.

Notwithstanding this immense army of the Russians, the French continued to advance, and the Russians to retreat, destroying almost every thing in their way. The immense magazines which they had in Samogitia were burned by themselves, which occasioned an enormous loss, not only to their finances, but still more to the subsistence of the people.

The corps of Doctorow, however, (viz. the sixth corps,) was, till the 27th of June, without any orders, and had made no movement. On the 28th it assembled, and put itself in motion, in order to proceed to the Dwina. On the 30th, its advanced-guard entered Soleinicki. It was charged by the light cavalry of General Baron Borde Sault, and driven out of the village. Doctorow, perceiving that he was anticipated, turned to the right, and made for Ochmiana. General Baron Pajol arrived at that place with his light cavalry, at the moment when Doctorow's van-guard entered it. General Pajol charged. The Russians were sabred and overthrown in the town. General Doctorow, perceiving that his route was intercepted, fell back upon Olehanoui. Marshal the Prince of Eckmuhl, with a division of infantry, the cuirassiers of the division of Count Valence, and the second regiment of light cavalry of the guard, moved upon Ochmiana, in order to support General Pajol. The corps of Doctorow, thus cut off and driven towards the south, continued to prosecute the movement on the right by forced marches, with a sacrifice of its baggage, upon Smoroghoui, Danowcheff, and Robouilnicki, whence he made for the Dwina. This movement had been foreseen by the French; and General Nansouty, with a division of cuirassiers, the division of light cavalry of Count Bruyeres, and Count Moran's division of infantry, advanced to Mikailitchki, with a view to cut off this corps. He arrived on the 3d of July at Swin, at the time when it passed that place, and pushed it briskly. He took a large number of waggons, and obliged the Russians to abandon some hundreds of baggage-carts. From these incessant skirmishes Doctorow's army suffered in a very severe manner.

Torrents of rain fell at this time during thirty-six hours, without intermission. The weather suddenly changed from extreme heat to extreme cold. Several thousands of horses perished by the effects of this sudden transition; and convoys of artillery were stopped by the mud. By this terrible storm, the march of the French army was retarded.

Though the French troops were assembled by the end of April, warlike operations did not commence till the 12th of June. These operations lasted five days, but were productive of no attack. In the several skirmishes which took place, the Grand Cossacks distinguished themselves. The Russian troops had been ordered to concentrate, in order to avoid a general engagement, until Prince Bagration's approach.

Major-general Korf, commanding the rear-guard of the 2d and 3d corps, repulsed all the attacks of the enemy, in the road to Dosna, and the horse-artillery, under the command of General Count Kutusoff.

On the 18th of June, o. s. (June 30,) Captain Galewa, of the regiment of Polish Hulans, was sent on a reconnoitring party, with a squadron intrusted to him, by the orders of Major-general Korf. On the evening of the 20th, he received orders to pass the village Lantupa, and to take his course to the town of Swenziany. On the morning of the following day, having collected his out-parties, he set out with a view of returning to his regiment; but all the places through which he had to pass were already occupied by three regiments of the enemy's cavalry. Captain Galewa seeing himself thus cut off, formed his squadron in column, and cut his way through the enemy's troops. Having succeeded in dashing through these, he was a second time met, in a wood, by a party of chasseurs, who endeavoured to intercept his route; but he quickly put them to flight. His loss consisted in one officer, and forty-six privates; and that of the enemy in two chiefs of squadron, and a considerable number of Hulans, grenadiers, and chasseurs, killed.

At the commencement of the Russian campaign, the French, according to their bulletins, won every victory, and the Russians, according to their accounts, sustained no loss. The latter had, indeed, to repel an atrocious invasion under great disadvantages. The population of the Russian empire has a character peculiarly its own. It is spread over such a vast surface and extent of country, that it is a point of time and difficulty to collect it into a given place of union. When such a power, therefore, was invaded by a strong and even numerous army, the first difficulty was to collect such a force as might meet the inroad. Russia got over this difficulty, and very wisely appointed commanders, well known for their skill, experience, and fidelity. The Cossacks were also useful men in the field. Nothing can elude a Cossack's activity, escape his penetration, or surprise his vigilance. Mounted on a very little ill-conditioned, but well-bred horse, which can walk at the rate of five miles an hour, with ease, or in his speed dispute the race with the swiftest; with a short whip on his wrist, armed with the lance, a pistol in his girdle, and a sword, he never fears a competitor in single combat. The Cossacks act in dispersion, and when they do re-unite to charge, it is not with a systematic formation, but en masse, or what in Germany is called the Swarm attack. No cavalry has power, like them, to march for days and nights, climbing hills, swimming rivers, and winding through valleys without interruption.

The defeat of Marmont, by Lord Wellington, on the plains of Salamanca, served as a stimulus to the Emperor Alexander, and this glorious achievement was very properly celebrated at this period, by illuminations in England. A prayer of thanksgiving for the same, was also read in all churches and chapels throughout England and Wales. The victory of Salamanca confirmed the Emperor Alexander in his generous purpose of making another venture for the safety of Europe. It strengthened the hands and councils of the Russian ministry, and provided them with strong arguments to oppose the peace-party of the court of Petersburg. No victory, in the course of the war, happened more opportunely for every interest—for England, Spain, and the northern allies; and no defeat was attended with more serious consequences to the now-declining hopes of the French emperor.

Moscow had contributed towards the war 3,000,000 of silver rubles, and 100,000 men equipped. At St. Petersburg immense subscriptions were made, and 70,000 men were there organised. The enthusiastic patriotism of all ranks in Old Russia, in succouring the army, was beyond description.

CHAPTER II.

Battles of Dressa;—Of Riga;—Of Ostrovno;—Of Mohilow;—Of Polotzk;—Of Smolensko;—Of Valentina; and of Borodino.—The French enter Moscow.—Observations.

THE first Russian army, after passing Polotzk, made forced marches towards Witepsk. The corps of Lieutenant-general Count Wittgen-stein, which had been strengthened with some battalions of reserve, remained at Drissa, in order to observe the movements of the enemy, as well as to secure the Pskowisch road. To effect a junction of the two armies was the principal object of their movements. Prince Bagration's advanced-guard, under the command of Lieutenant-general Najewskji, was in the neighbourhood of Magilew. General Platoff, who commanded the rear-guard of Prince Bagration, was attacked near Romanoff by seven French regiments of cavalry, of the King of Westphalia's corps, which were totally defeated, and pursued for fifteen wersts. In this action, the first regiment of cavalry, Yagers, one of the best of the enemy's regiments, and one cavalry grenadier-regiment, were entirely destroyed; two colonels, sixteen officers, and 300 privates, taken prisoners.

The corps of Prince Wittgenstein having passed the Dwina, and retiring towards Riga, General Lewes was charged with covering the retreat of that prince. On the 21st of July, there took place, between him and the Prussian Generals Growert and Kleist, an action in which the Russians were forced to retreat, having lost 300 in killed, wounded, and prisoners.

The west suburbs of Riga, with all the timber and piles of masts, were ordered to be burnt. Four thousand Russians were obliged to cut through 12,000 Prussians, (allies of the French) near Mittau, and retreated into Riga.

In the battle of Mohilow, July 23, the French claimed the victory over Prince Bagration. On the 25th they attacked the advanced-guard of General Bagration, but were driven back with the loss of 8,000 men. On the same day the main Russian army was attacked, and equally successful, the French being repulsed with the loss of 6,000 men. On the 30th and 31st a French corps, under the command of General Oudinot, attacked the Russians under the command of General Osterman, and were repulsed with great slaughter, leaving 3,000 prisoners, two pieces of cannon, and a great quantity of baggage; their loss in killed was estimated at 5,000 men.

It was reported at this time, on the authority of a private letter from Riga, that a gentleman, whose country-seat was at a distance from that town, was approached by the army under Macdonald, which officer, and fourteen others, were invited to partake of an elegant dinner. They were hospitably entertained, and in every respect treated with liberality; in return for which, on the close of the evening, Macdonald ordered every article of plate to be removed from the table, which, with every other valuable article, was packed up and conveyed away. The proprietor did not venture to complain, but made his escape, lest he might be compelled to accompany his plate.

The first Russian army took a strong position near Witepsk, and during their march, even from Polotzk, the enemy never dared to attack a single corps of which it was composed. The small skirmishes of the van-guard along the banks of the Dwina, across which river the Russian cavalry frequently swam, for the purpose of seizing the enemy's piquets, were always to their advantage. After their arrival, it was necessary to make strong reconnoissances decisive with regard to the junction with the first. In the night, between the 13th and 14th of July (o. s.) the commander-in-chief, who had received information of patrols of the enemy having shewn themselves on the road to Bischenkowitschi, gave orders to Count Osterman Tolstoc to direct his march towards that place, with his corps. Scarcely had Count Tolstoc advanced three wersts, before he fell in with the enemy's videttes. Two videttes were taken, but the third escaped, and gave the alarm to the French van-guard. These caused immediately a regiment to march out against the two hussar squadrons of the guard, which were in front of this column. They charged the enemy, and immediately overthrew him, but pursuing with too much ardour, they fell in with the whole of the enemy's cavalry, by whom they were pursued close in with the Russian infantry. Count Osterman then continued his motions, and found the enemy drawn up in the order of battle, at no great distance from Ostrovno. The battle commenced with a cannonade, which continued several hours. Both sides fought with the utmost obstinacy. The greater number of warriors were on the French side, but the valour of the Russians overcame every thing. They not only remained masters of the field of battle, but even pursued the enemy four wersts beyond his position. Great loss was sustained on both sides.

The corps of General Doctorow, who had directions to observe the motions of the enemy in the vicinity of Bischen Kolwitsch, where a part of their troops were discovered marching towards him, began to make motions which retarded their progress. It was therefore necessary to suffer them to pass the Dwina, in order to join the army which was stationed near Witepsk, on the left bank of that river. In order to perform this, the commander-in-chief deemed it necessary to confine him back to these places, where, on July 13, Count Osterman had stopped him, with a much smaller force than that of the enemy. Count Kowhoweezen was ordered on this service. He replaced the corps of Osterman, and his division was, the whole of the 14th, continually engaged.

The enemy did not gain a single foot of ground of the Russian troops. Lieutenant-general Kowhoweezen repulsed all their attacks, and did not leave the spot till night, when he received orders from the commander-in-chief to take the position ordained to him for a general battle. Meanwhile General Doctorow passed the Dwina, and arrived at the same place. The whole rear-guard came under the command of Major-general Count Von Pahlen. They were drawn up at ten wersts distance from the head position, and the enemy was reported to be bearing towards them. In the interim, the commander-in-chief received a letter, by a courier, from Prince Bagratiou, who informed him, that having been advised of the approach of the first army, and finding Mogileu already in the possession of the enemy's troops, he had, for the preservation of his men, altered the direction of his march to Pisch, and had taken the road to Moteslaw and Smolensk—that his van-guard had, on the preceding day, a brisk engagement, in which Lieutenant-general Rajewsky had defeated the van-guard of Marshal Davoust's army, and forced it to retreat a distance of twelve wersts.

This intelligence changed the commander-in-chief's first plan, and determined him, instead of giving battle in the vicinity of Witepsk, to march towards Smolensk, and so much the more, as Marshal Davoust could take his march thither with his whole force, and by the same road. He took this bold determination at the very moment when the rear-guard was engaged in the hottest fight—he manœuvred in the face of the enemy, and drew himself back in three columns. The commander-in-chief attributed the good effect of this undertaking chiefly to the admirable disposition of Count Von Pahlen, who, by covering the army, had on this occasion shewn proofs of every thing that could be produced by skill and the art of war. The borders of the small river Lutchept were defended with such obstinacy, that the enemy lost a number of men in killed. General Von Pahlen likewise understood how to render the smallest defile of utility, and an ambush laid in a suitable place in the vicinity round Gaponowschtschesna, had, on the march of the 17th, cut up seven French squadrons.

Count Wittgenstein remained on the banks of the Dwina, at the advanced work of Pokaseuze, to observe the enemy stationed opposite to him on the other bank, and having thrown bridges across the river in the course of the night, he sent his cavalry out several times on expeditions, and which, in the course of eight days, took eight officers and about 1,000 men prisoners, from the corps of the general of brigade, St. Genie, and almost entirely destroyed the 7th and 11th regiments of French Yagers; the 8th Hulus; and the 10th regiment of Foot Yagers; both Poles, were nearly cut up. On the 17th of July, Count Wittgenstein received information from his detachments from Drissa, that Marshal Oudinot, Duke of Reggio, after having passed the Drissa with his corps, was on his march to Sebesch from Dunaburgh. He was informed that Marshal Macdonald had crossed the river at Jacobstadt, and was shaping his march for Lusye; and according to the statement of a French officer of the general staff, whom they had taken prisoner, those troops at the churches were destined to cut the count off from the road of Pschkow. In this station he resolved to attack the enemy nearest to him, in the church of the village Klastiga, and discovered the corps of Oudinot stationed before the village Jackubow; at the distance of five wersts, and which was already approaching to meet him from Klastiga. He attacked it with impetuosity, and after an obstinate and bloody engagement, which lasted without intermission for three days, from morning early till late at night, he obtained the victory over the corps of Marshal Oudinot, which consisted of three divisions of the flower of the French infantry, which was totally beaten and thrown into the greatest confusion; it retired in disorder, and only escaped by means of the woody places, and by crossing over the small rivulets, the bridges of which they set on fire and destroyed, and at the same time laying hindrance in their way at almost every step, to stop the rapidity with which they were pursued. The commander of divisions of Le Grand and Verdier were both wounded. The loss of the Russians was great. Count Wittgenstein was wounded in the cheek, near the temple, by a bullet.

In the battle of Smolensk, August 16, the French, according to their own official details, did wonders. This place was set on fire, and the French were employed three days in quenching the fire. "Of twelve divisions," said the French bulletins, "which composed the grand Russian army, two divisions had been broken and defeated in the combats of Ostrovno; two met with the same fate in the battle of Mohilow, and six in the battle of Smolensk. Only two divisions of the guards remained entire." They afterwards reported that these two remaining divisions had suffered by the battle of Valentina. In this battle the French acknowledged to have lost 600 killed, and 2,600 wounded.

Sir Robert Wilson, who was present at the battles of Smolensk and Valentina, asserted, that on the 17th Bonaparte attacked Smolensk with his whole force, first on the eastern, then on the southern, and in the evening on the western face; but that he was repulsed in all his attacks, and merely succeeded in firing the town. On the 18th the Russians took a position on the right of the Nieper, waiting an attack; but the French merely sent across into the suburb the Spanish and Portuguese brigade, which were driven back just as they had set fire to the suburb. On the 19th the Russians retired on the Moscow road, when the French attacked their rear-guard. The attacks on different parts lasted the whole day, when the Russians effected the retreat of their whole army without the loss of a gun. The loss of the Russians on the 17th, was about 6,000 and BOOK X. two generals; of the French above 12,000; and on the 18th, each army was supposed to have lost 3,000 men.

CHAP. II.

1812.

It was mentioned in the dispatches from Sir Robert Wilson, that the conduct of General Barclay de Tolly in the battle of Smolensk, had incurred much animadversion; and that this was the cause of that general's having been superseded in the chief command of the Russian army by General Kutusoff. It was stated, that thrice had the Russian army repulsed the enemy at Smolensk, but that being prepared to renew the attack a fourth time, the Russian general had ordered a retreat, and left the French masters of the town.

On the 1st and 2d of September, the French head-quarters were at Ghjat. The Ghjat river empties itself into the Wolga, and is navigable to the Caspian sea. The city of Ghjat contains a population of 8 or 10,000. Many of the houses are built of stone and brick, and it has several parish-churches. The Russians set fire to this city as well as to the other places which they abandoned, but the French entered in time to extinguish it.

September 5, the French army was in motion, and in the afternoon, they perceived the Russians formed with their right upon the Moskwa, the left upon the heights on the left bank of the Kologha. At 1,200 toises in advance of the left, the Russians had begun to fortify a fine height, between two woods, where they had placed 9 or 10,000 men. The French emperor, having reconnoitred it, resolved to carry this position. Two hours afterwards the attack commenced, and the redoubt was carried, with the cannon.

The village of Borodino was attacked and carried by the French. The following is a correct account of this battle:

The Russian army, having experienced commanders, continued its retreat upon the village of Borodino, between Mosjaisk and Irisk, on the high Moscow road. It was here reinforced by 18,000 effective men, under General Miloradowitch, and 21,000 militia, chiefly armed with pikes, under General Markow. The total number of the Russian army, exclusive of militia, amounted to 105,000 effective men; the French army amounted to 130,000, reinforcements having been drawn to it from the military posts occupied by the enemy.

Bonaparte, contrary to all expectation, as he had omitted the favorable moment for attacking the Russians on their march from Smolensk, to repass the Dnieper, presented his army in order of battle Sept. 4. It is possible that the appointment of Prince Kutusoff had baffled his hopes of peace; and that he felt himself now obliged to effect that by force, which he was in hopes to have obtained by the influence of fear on the Russian cabinet. Certain it is, that he himself regretted his former neglect of opportunity, and that he said, "I have lost one of the most brilliant occasions of my life."

Prince Bagration's army sustained the Russian left; but it was very much advanced in front of the centre and right. A battery of seven guns on a hill covered the advance of Prince Bagration's army, which we shall call the second army.

The action began about two o'clock in the afternoon of the 5th, and was furiously fought on both sides until near dusk, when the enemy possessed himself of the hill and battery, and obliged the second army to retire and take up its position in alignement with the first army, keeping some hills in its front, on which batteries were erected. On the morning of the 6th, the French, with all their force, again fell upon Prince Bagration; after a desperate resistance broke in upon him; obliged his retreat in some disorder; and the reserves of the first army were under the necessity of moving to the left and front, to cover his works and oppose the enemy; which service was effectually executed, and the second army being rallied again, advanced into battle, and in its turn supported the troops that had covered it. The Russian line was, however, obliged to throw back its left a little, so as to form an angle with a part of the centre and right. At the salient point of this angle was a battery, which, if taken and kept by the enemy, would have commanded the whole Russian position, and obliged a retreat. Bonaparte, finding that the Russians remained steady, notwithstanding his tremendous artillery cross-fire, resolved to have this work carried. Various attempts were made during the day, by cavalry and infantry, but they were always repulsed. Towards nine o'clock in the morning, General Bonami had, however, lodged himself in the battery, in front of the Russian left; but General Gormouloff seizing the command of a column, (for he was a staff-officer), rushed upon the battery, re-carried it, put every man in it to the bayonet, except General Bonami, who fairly escaped with twenty wounds, one of which struck into his breast. Towards dusk, the enemy's force retired, abandoning the battery, which he had again carried about four o'clock in the afternoon, and which battery had been taken and retaken three times during the day. He gradually withdrew back upon some works in his rear, out of cannon-shot, and from thence fell back about two wersts and an half, with his main body; giving orders for his heavy guns, &c. to retire upon Mosjaisk. The Russian army remained upon the field until the next evening, when Prince Kutusoff fell back three wersts with his main body, and left General Platoff, with his Cassacks, to occupy the ground in front of Borodino.

Thus terminated, September 7. the memorable battle of Borodino; and so far it resembled the battle of Preuss Eylau, but not in its consequences; for Eylau preserved Königsberg, whereas Borodino accelerated the loss of Moscow.

The Russians had 25,000 killed and wounded (one half killed). The loss of the French was greater.

Two days after this battle, Prince Kutusoff retired a short distance on the Moscow road; he then endeavoured to find a position more tenable near Moscow; but not being able to find one, he retired, after a council of war, to a strong position, leaving the enemy to enter the city of Moscow, which they did on the 14th. The Russians, however, had set fire to several parts of Moscow, before they had quitted it.

In the possession of Moscow, Bonaparte hoped to secure for his army good winter-quarters, and abundance of supplies. For the attainment of the first object, enough of the town had been rescued from the flames; for though the buildings in Moscow consist chiefly of small wooden houses, there are whole streets of stone and brick palaces, roofed with iron, and the walls of these edifices are so prodigiously thick, that the conflagration could scarcely spread through them. The phrase used in the French Bulletin "Moscow is no more," was perhaps employed to produce a strong impression on the minds of the Russian people, and to alienate their affections from their government, as the alleged cause of such destruction.

But though a sufficient number of buildings remained to afford barracks for the French army, it was difficult to imagine how this army was to be subsisted through a long winter in this rigorous climate. The statement in the 20th Bulletin, that "every house was provided for eight months with necessaries of every description," was false. The season for laying in a stock of provisions had not arrived when the French entered Moscow. It is only about the middle of October, just before the snow begins to fall, that the winter supplies are collected. At other seasons of the year, the general stock of provisions in the town is calculated only for a short period of consumption. It was equally false that the French found large supplies of wines, brandy, &c. in the cellars. The middle and inferior classes at Moscow are altogether without any supplies whatever of these articles. They are obliged to be contented with humble kvass, for their beverage. In the cellars of the richer and higher orders alone were such supplies to be discovered, but in no proportion to the quantity stated in the bulletin. BOOK X.

The necessity for collecting stores for the winter is occasioned by the cessation of all intercourse between Moscow and the smaller towns, villages, and estates, during that severe season. Except the great and leading roads of the empire, every highway and footpath is lost in the fallen snow. It is difficult to conceive how the French army could have obtained the means of subsistence for the winter, surrounded, as it must have been, by impassable and trackless snow, and by a hostile population. CHAP. II.
1812.

Bonaparte asserted, that he found in Moscow 60,000 stand of arms, and 150 pieces of cannon. There is no arsenal at Moscow; and the prodigious extent of the town renders it perfectly indefensible. It is surrounded by no fortified lines, and so numerous a park of artillery was not requisite for the defence of the Kremlin.

A circumstance which at this time escaped general observation was, the probable diminution of the numbers of the French, by the effects of climate alone, at this season of the year. There are three rivers, which partly surround and flow through the city of Moscow, and the fogs and exhalations from them, just previously to the falling of the snow, are extremely injurious to the health even of the inhabitants seasoned to the climate.

While the numbers of the French army were thus diminishing, to those of the Russian troops a constant augmentation was made. The destruction of the greater part of Moscow, instead of dispiriting the Russian nobility, exasperated and animated them to the greatest exertions and sacrifices. Already had they placed one-tenth of their vassals at the disposal of the government: and it was calculated, that, by this mode of supply, upwards of 400,000 men might be raised. In Russia there are forty-two provincial or departmental governments: and it was supposed, that even the smallest would be able to raise nearly 10,000 recruits.

In penetrating to Moscow, it appeared that Bonaparte calculated on a certain spirit of disaffection to the government, which had generally been known to exist in that part of the empire; but he seemed to have committed the gross error of concluding, that, because the Muscovite nobility were dissatisfied with the government, he should find them ready to join a Corsican invader. He was deceived and disappointed.

CHAPTER III.

Reported Death of Bonaparte.—Conspiracy against the French Government.—Treaty of Peace between Russia and the Porte; and between Great Britain and Russia.—The Emperor Alexander's Address to his People.—Mittau recovered from the French.—Zeal of the Russians.—Critical Situation of Bonaparte.—His Proposals for Peace.—Defeat of Murat, and Flight of the French from Moscow.—Polotzk recovered by the Russians.—Their Successes, and Retreat of Bonaparte.—Various Actions.—Destruction of the French Reur.—Emperor Alexander's Proclamations.—Escape of Bonaparte.

BOOK X.

CHAP. III.

1812.

ALL the conflicts between the French and Russians during the advance of the former from Witepsk to Moscow might, with greater propriety, be termed skirmishes than battles. In the interim, a report prevailed in France, that Bonaparte was mortally wounded in one of these actions. It was stated in the minor Paris papers, but not in the official journal, (the Moniteur) "that having greatly exposed his person in the late engagements, Bonaparte had been dreadfully wounded, and was either dead or not expected to survive." This rumour gained some credit on the English coast, and particularly in Holland; but Providence preserved the Corsican's life, to establish the fame of the Conqueror of Massena and Marmont!

The French generals, Mallet, Guillet, and Lahorie, who were probably the reporters of Bonaparte's death, seized this opportunity of conspiring against the French government, but they were soon arrested; and the Moniteur laboured to convince the Parisians that Bonaparte was in good health.

Mallet, a general of brigade, a staunch jacobin, was employed in the army of Italy, under Bonaparte, before the latter went to Egypt; and about the year 1808, when the French General Miollis was appointed military commander of Rome, Mallet was his Chef de l'Etat Major, but in consequence of some violent expressions made use of by him, concerning the manner the pope was treated, he was sent to Paris as a prisoner, and was obliged to retire on half-pay.

Guillet was likewise a general of brigade, and formerly employed under Hoche in the Vendée; he had been in the army ever since; and being likewise of the jacobinical school, he got himself into trouble with his friend Mallet, for having, at a public table, in company with the Senators Tracey, Garat, and Cabanes, and the deputy attorney-general of the council of prizes in Paris, Florent Guyot (formerly a member of the convention, and a great jacobin), made use of strong expressions against Bonaparte. It was even reported in Paris, at that time, that there were sufficient grounds to try them. The senators were only reprimanded for their intemperate conduct; but the generals Mallet, Guillet, and Florent Guyot, were sent to the Temple, and afterwards to the Chateau de Vincennes; the last remained in confinement, but the two first were restored to their rank.

Lahorie was a general of brigade, and one of General Moreau's great favourites, having formerly belonged to his staff. When this general was arrested in 1804, Lahorie, in company with Fresuieres, Moreau's secretary, fled to Germany, having been accused of being implicated in the conspiracy of Pichegru, Georges, &c. He returned to France about 1809, but was not restored to his rank. All these men were the friends of Fouché, who was at that time in Paris.

A treaty of peace was at this time concluded between Russia and the Sublime Porte, by which the latter relinquished all provinces, fortresses, downs, &c. lying on the left bank of the Pruth; and his imperial majesty restored to the Ottoman Porte the territory of Moldavia, on the right bank of the Pruth, and the Greater and Lesser Wallachia. A treaty of peace was also signed between Great Britain and Austria, on the 1st of August.

Notwithstanding the entrance of the French into Moscow, the Emperor Alexander (owing in a great measure to Lord Wellington's success) was determined to carry on the war with additional vigour, as appears by his imperial majesty's animating address to his people:—

"It is with a heavy heart we are compelled to inform every son of the country, that the enemy entered Moscow on the 3d (14th) of September. The glory of the Russian empire, however, is not thereby tarnished. On the contrary, every individual is inspired with resolute courage, firmness, and hope, that all the evils meditated against us by our enemies will eventually fall upon their own heads. The enemy has not become master of Moscow by overcoming, or weakening, our forces; the commander-in-chief, by the advice of a council of war, has found it expedient to retire at a moment of necessity, in order, by the best and most effectual means to turn the transient triumph of the enemy to his inevitable ruin. However painful it may be to Russians, to hear that the original capital of the empire is in the hands of the enemy of their country, yet it is consolatory to reflect, that he is possessed merely of bare walls, containing within their circuit neither inhabitants nor provisions. The haughty conqueror imagined that on his entrance into Moscow he would become the arbiter of the whole Russian empire, when he might prescribe to it such a peace as he should think proper; but he is deceived in his expectations: he will neither have acquired the power of dictating, nor the means of subsistence. The assembled, and daily increasing, forces of the districts of Moscow, will not neglect to block up every avenue, and to destroy such parties as may be detached for the purpose of collecting provisions; until the enemy shall perceive that his hopes of astonishing the world, by the capture of Moscow, were vain, and he be compelled to open a passage for himself by force.

"His situation is as follows:—He entered Russia with 300,000 men, the principal part consisting of natives of different kingdoms, serving and obeying him, not from free-will—not in the defence of their respective countries—but solely from terror. The half of this multifarious army has been destroyed, partly by our brave troops, partly by desertion, and partly by hunger and sickness: with the remainder he is come to Moscow. His audacious irruption, not only into the very heart of Russia, but into its ancient capital, will, without doubt, gratify his ambition, and give him cause of boasting; but the character of that measure must be determined by its result.

"He has not entered a country where every step he takes inspires all with terror, and bends both the troops and the inhabitants to his feet. Russia is unaccustomed to subjection, and will not suffer her laws, religion, freedom, and property to be trampled upon: she will defend them to the last drop of her blood. Hitherto the general zeal against the enemy clearly evinces how powerfully our empire is guarded by the undaunted spirit of its sons. Thus no one despairs, nor is this a time to despair, when every class of the empire is inspired with courage and firmness; when the enemy, with the remainder of his daily decreasing forces, at a distance from home, in the midst of a numerous people, is surrounded by our armies, one of which stands before him, and the other three are endeavouring to cut off his retreat, and to prevent him from receiving any fresh reinforcements—when Spain has not only thrown off his yoke, but also threatens to invade his territories—when the greatest part of Europe (exhausted and enslaved by him) serving him involuntarily, is anxiously and impatiently awaiting the moment when she shall tear herself from his heavy and insupportable chains—when his own country sees no end to the torrents of its blood shed for his ambition.

"In the present disastrous state of human affairs, will not that country acquire eternal fame, which, after encountering all the inevitable desolations of war, shall at last, by its patience and intrepidity, succeed in procuring an equitable and permanent peace, not only for itself, but also for other powers; nay, even for those who are unwillingly fighting against us? It is gratifying and natural for a generous nation to render good for evil.

"Almighty God! turn thy merciful eye to thy supplicating Russian church. Vouchsafe courage and patience to thy people struggling in a just cause, so that they may thereby overcome the enemy; and in saving themselves, may also defend the freedom of kings and nations."

A powerful Russian force assembled to the westward, of which the Moldavian army formed a part. Count Wittgenstein had several brilliant affairs with the enemy on the Dwina, and a corps from Riga, under General Essen, took possession of Mittau, Sept. 30, the French every where retreating before it. Such was the zeal of all ranks of the Russians, manifested by contributions and personal voluntary service, that their army was soon reinforced.

General Winzingerode stood in the road to Moscow, near Twer, with a corps of about 30,000 men; and Prince Kutusoff's army to the southward of Moscow. It was the intention of the Russian generals to close Bonaparte in, so that he could receive neither supplies nor troops, and be consequently forced to cut his way out of Moscow.

Prince Kutusoff, (a resolute and courageous man) in the course of ten days took 5,000 prisoners. Such was the critical situation of Bonaparte, that he sent a message to this prince, offering peace, by Count Lauriston.

Lauriston was received by Prince Kutusoff in the midst of all his generals. He opened the conference by saying, that he had been sent to demand an armistice, and to beg the prince to transmit to his majesty a letter from Bonaparte, which would contain proposals for peace, in order to cause the cessation of that horrible effusion of blood, which had been shed with so much desperation and barbarity.

The prince replied, that he was not authorised to receive any proposal either for peace or armistice; and that unquestionably he would not receive any letter addressed to his majesty; that, besides, it was his duty to declare, that the Russian army was in possession of too many advantages to throw them away by an armistice, of which it had no need.

Lauriston observed, that the war must one day

BOOK X. come to a termination, for it could not last for ever, especially in the barbarous manner in which it was conducted.

CHAP. III.

1812.

Prince Kutusoff replied, that barbarism had been introduced into hostilities by the French revolutionists, and followed up to the greatest extent by Bonaparte himself. It was true, that the war could not be eternal; but peace could never be talked of till the French were beyond the Vistula. That Russia had not provoked the war; for the emperor, by falling with all his forces on the magazines and troops in Poland, might have annihilated all the preparations of Bonaparte on the other side of the Vistula, before he was in readiness to commence it; but his majesty wished neither to disturb the existing tranquillity, nor to be the aggressor, and to the last hoped to preserve peace; that Bonaparte had entered Russia even without a declaration of war, and devastated a great part of the empire; that he had nothing to do but to get out of Moscow how he could, since he came thither without being invited; so it became the duty of Russians to do him as much mischief as possible: that when he proclaimed the campaign terminated at Moscow, the Russians viewed it as only commencing; if he did not know this already, he should soon be taught it by experience.

"Since then," said Lauriston, "there is no hope of peace, it will doubtless be necessary to march; but in departing it will again be necessary to shed the blood of men who are always brave, since your armies are marching on all sides."

"I again repeat to you," replied the prince, "you of course will adopt such measures as you can, in order to get off—and we, to prevent you. For the rest, the time will come, perhaps, when we may arrange matters for your departure, should that be the only subject of discussion."

Lauriston still uttered complaints with regard to the bitterness and fury which had been excited in the people, in order to banish all hope of accommodation, by attributing to the French the conflagration and ruin of Moscow, while the inhabitants themselves were the authors of that calamity.

The prince replied, "that it was the first time he had ever heard of complaints being made against the enthusiasm and devotion to their country, of a whole people who defended their homes against an enemy by whom they were attacked, and who, by so doing, had excited that animosity and fury now complained of, but which, on the contrary, could not be too highly appreciated and extolled. With regard to the burning of Moscow," said the prince, "I am too old, I have had too much experience in war, and possessed too much of the confidence of the Russian people, not to be daily and hourly informed of what was passing in Moscow; I myself ordered the destruction of some magazines; but from the arrival of the French at Moscow, the Russians destroyed nothing but the stores of the cartwrights, when you adopted the resolution of seizing them, by distributing the carriages at your pleasure: the inhabitants caused very few conflagrations. You proceeded systematically in the destruction of that capital, fixing the particular days, and marking out the quarters which were to be set on fire at fixed periods. I have had an exact account of the whole; it has been followed with precision; and one proof that it was not the inhabitants who ruined Moscow is, that you destroyed with cannon-shot the houses, and other edifices, built with too much solidity, hurling balls against them amidst the flames. Undoubtedly we shall endeavour to revenge ourselves. Our conference is closed."

Lauriston had no reason to be satisfied with the issue of this conference. The French had been long accustomed to arrange matters of this sort in a tête-à-tête, or by an amicable interview; but here more than thirty persons were witnesses, on the one hand, of the dignity of the Russian marshal, and on the other, of the cringing meanness of a low fellow commissioned by a brigand.

On the 18th of October, a brilliant affair took place between the advanced-guard of the French and Russian armies near Moscow, in which the former, under Murat, were defeated with great loss. Marshal Kutusoff having learnt that the corps of Victor had quitted Smolensko, to reinforce the grand army, resolved to attack the advanced-guard, being 45,000 strong, in order to defeat Murat before the junction of Victor, and before Napoleon could support him with the main body of his army. Thirty-eight pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the Russians, as well as a standard of honor belonging to the 1st regiment of cuirassiers. They made 1,500 prisoners, amongst whom was a general; 2,000 men were left on the field of battle. The loss of the Russians was inconsiderable. Moscow was now re-occupied by General Winzingerode's corps. The French in their flight left several thousand sick, in the most miserable state.

In the mean time, Count Steinheil drove the enemy from the village of Bolonia, and pursued him towards Polotzk. When Count Wittgenstein (who had the day before, after a desperate engagement, defeated the French, under Marshal Gouvion St. Cyr, at the village of Guravitchne) received this intelligence, he attacked the enemy, and drove him out of his strong entrenchments. The French took refuge in the town of Polotzk, which is surrounded by a double palisade, where they maintained themselves nearly the whole night, keeping up a constant fire of musketry on all sides from behind the palisades, as well as out of the houses. Count Wittgenstein gave orders for his ordnance to fire upon them with round and grape, and at last directed his advanced-guard to storm the place in two divisions; the first under the command of Major-generals Platoff and Diebitch, and the other under the command of Colonel Riediger, of the Grodno regiment of hussars. Lieutenant-general Cazanove, as soon as he perceived that his troops were close before Polotzk, threw himself also upon the enemy, and was the first who marched with them into the town. In this manner, at three in the morning of October the 8th, the place was carried.

The loss of the enemy was great, all the places of action being covered with dead bodies; but their loss would have been greater had Lieutenant-general Count Steinheil been able to follow them to Polotzk; but, to his great mortification, he was stopped by the intervention of superior force, five wersts from the town. The loss of the Russians was also considerable.

After Count Wittgenstein's entrance into Polotzk, the French suffered much by the fortunate operations of Count Steinheil's corps. Victor was forced, with his corps, to separate from the grand army. They left Smolensko by forced marches, and joined the weak remains of St. Cyr's army, which was commanded by General Le Grand, St. Cyr having gone to Wilna, on account of a wound which he had received in the foot.

When Bonaparte left Moscow, he ordered Murat to attack General Benningsen, but he was driven back. Bonaparte then attacked Kutusoff in person, with great desperation, near Maloyaroslavitz, October 24, and was again repulsed. This little town was taken and re-taken eight different times; at last the French were obliged to retreat. Bonaparte then intended to fight a general battle; and if he was conqueror, to march by way of Kaluga to Poland, and there remain in winter-quarters, as near Galicia as possible; but he found the Russians so fortified, that it was impossible. He had, therefore, nothing left but to concentrate his whole force, and return by way of Smolensko, which was entirely laid waste. The bad roads and the dreadful wants the French were in, gave Kutusoff time to come up with them near Viasma, when he gave them battle, and defeated them. Before the battle, Bonaparte gave the command to Murat, and went himself with 6,000 men to Smolensko, on his way home; but he was met by Gen. Oertel's detachment, which obliged him to return; he then tried to retreat by the road which goes from Smolensko towards the sea; there he was met by Wittgenstein's advanced-guard, was beaten, and obliged to fall back on the grand army.

At this time he had in front of him Tormasow's, Tchitchagoff's, and Wittgenstein's armies, and in his rear Prince Kutusoff with 150,000 men.

The Russians took daily 3 or 4,000 prisoners; Wittgenstein made in one day 6,000, and took twenty-three pieces of cannon; Platoff thirty pieces of cannon, and 3,700 prisoners.

As soon as General Kutusoff was apprised of Bonaparte's retreat, he broke up with his whole army, and followed the enemy.

The Russian advanced-guard, under Platoff, overtook the French army on the 1st of November, near Kolotak, not far from Borodino, and took from them two colours and twenty-four pieces of cannon.

On the 2d of November, Gen. Miloradowitsch, supported by Platoff, attacked several French corps near Viasma, commanded by the Vice King of Italy, Davoust, and Ney; these corps were completely defeated, and lost one colour, five cannon, and 2,000 prisoners, amongst whom was General Pettien. The whole road to Mojaisk was covered with ammunition-waggons and dead horses. The French army retreated daily upwards of fifty wersts.

On the 7th, General Miloradowitsch entered Dorogobush. The enemy attempted some resistance, but was driven from his advantageous position by the Russian chasseurs, with the loss of 300 men taken prisoners, exclusive of the sick and wounded.

On the 9th, Count Orloff Denizoff successfully pursued several French foraging detachments, and took 126 prisoners and twenty-two waggons. The loss of the enemy in killed amounted to 200 men.

Colonel Adrianoff attacked a detachment of the enemy near Dubovtchina, put them to flight, and took a standard and 175 men, also five tumbrils of ammunition.

The enemy halted some time at the convent of Baldin; but on perceiving the approach of the Russian cavalry, fled with precipitation, after exploding thirty-eight tumbrils of ammunition, and throwing one cannon into the ditch of the convent.

Count Orloff obtained considerable advantages near Guichkowo, killing 200 of the enemy, and making 180 prisoners, of whom the greater part were French guards. He, in addition, captured thirty provision-waggons, which the enemy had collected on the road.

On the 10th, several of Count Orloff's detachments overtook the enemy near the ferry of Solovino, attacked with impetuosity, and captured eight ammunition-waggons loaded with cartridges, a forge, &c. and made 155 prisoners. The same day other parties under the count's command sent in 102 prisoners.

On being informed that the enemy, to the amount of 9,000 men, were marching in three divisions on the road from Jelinia to Smolensko, General Count Orloff, having formed a junction with three corps of partisans, resolved to attack one of the said divisions posted in the village of Lewkowo. The enemy perceiving his intention, promptly occupied a height in its environs. Having been dislodged from thence by his artillery, they fell back upon the village, and were instantly surrounded by his cavalry, and compelled to lay down their arms, after a feeble resistance. This was the first instance during the war, of a whole corps laying down its arms. It consisted of 2,000 men, and sixty officers, under the orders of General Augereau.

Some detachments of cavalry were sent by the enemy to support General Augereau, but General Count Orloff overthrew them, and pursued them with great slaughter.

The enemy lost in his retreat from Dorogobush, to the river Ougeat, three cannon and forty men; and General Jourkosky, who pursued the enemy with his light cavalry as far as the ferry of Tolowieuro, made 940 prisoners, took eighteen cannon, and sixty ammunition-waggons.

Since the battle of Borodino, of the 7th of September, the Russian grand army took from the enemy 209 pieces of cannon; General Tormazoff, eight; and Count Wittgenstein, twenty-nine, making a total of 246 pieces of cannon. Besides which, several guns had been thrown into the rivers, or buried, or bogged in the woods. Both parties lost several generals; the most serious loss on the part of the Russians was the fall of Prince Bagration.

On the 9th of November, Count Orloff Denizoff, being advanced on the roads towards Smolensko and Krasnoi, received intelligence of the march of a French corps from Smolensko, in the direction of Kalouga, composed of fresh troops intended for the different regiments of guards; this force was under the command of General Barrage D'Hillier, having with him General Charpentier and Brigadier-general Augereau, brother to the marshal of that name. They were distributed in the three villages of Yasvin, Lakoff, and Dolgomust. A disposition of attack was immediately made by three partizan corps, commanded by Captain Seslavin, Colonel Davidoff, and Captain Phigner. The result was, that the corps under Charpentier was nearly cut to pieces, that Barrage D'Hillier having patiently heard a cannonade for several hours in the quarters of Augereau's division, made good his retreat to Smolensko, and that Augereau's corps, of 3,000 men, after losing nearly one-third of their number, laid down their arms, and capitulated to Captain Phigner, who had not 1,500 men, and who conducted this affair with infinite address and gallantry. In this corps were two squadrons of cavalry, well mounted. The prisoners amounted to one general, sixty staff and other officers, and 2,000 rank and file. The officers, who capitulated, stated the object of their march by that route was to open another communication in the direction of Kalouga; they were not aware of the retreat of their army.

At the same time Major-general Platoff, having pursued Beauharnois's corps, came up with it at the river Bone, near the estate called Yandsoff, and without regarding the advantages of his position, attacked the enemy; on this occasion, besides numbers of killed and wounded, he took thirty pieces of cannon and 200 prisoners.

Adjutant-general Orloff Denizoff attacked the enemy on their march to Krasnoi, killed 500 and took 400 on the 12th.

On the 14th General Count Wittgenstein was attacked by Marshal Victor, who had orders to drive him to the other side of the Dwina. The enemy was repulsed with the loss of from 2 to 3,000 men, and was pursued the next morning in his retreat towards Senno, when 600 prisoners were taken.

Nothing material occurred at this post till the 18th, when Count Wittgenstein was joined by Colonel Chernichef, aid-de-camp to his imperial majesty, who had been detached by Admiral Tchichagoff, with a small corps of light cavalry, to discover and ascertain General Count Wittgenstein's position. In the course of this expedition, the colonel had the singular good fortune to rescue Major-general Baron Winzingerode and his aid-de-camp, Captain Narishkin, between Wilna and Minsk; they were proceeding towards the frontier, under an escort of gens d'armes, and had been marched from Verrea, where they were presented to Bonaparte, with the French guards under the charge of Junot. Colonel Chernichef also took three couriers, one coming from, and the other two going to Paris. From these sources of intelligence it was ascertained that Bonaparte was at Smolensko on the 13th. During this expedition Colonel Chernichef marched 700 wersts in five days, and swam across several rivers.

The divisions of the French army, under Marshals Davoust and Ney, were totally defeated by Field-marshal Prince Kutusoff, who in actions from the 10th to the 20th of November, at Viasma and other places, took near 200 cannon, and 20,000 prisoners. Marshal Ney was wounded. Bonaparte was with Marshal Davoust's corps in the night of the 15th, and early on the 16th left the field of battle with full speed. Every precaution was provided by the Emperor Alexander to prevent the escape of the enemy.

Whilst the French were flying upon the Smolensko road, Kutusoff, with the main army, pursued them on a parallel line, endeavouring to get a head of them, and thereby, in the military phrase, to turn them. In the mean time, he dispatched Platoff to follow them in the rear on the high road by which they were flying, and, in this manner, at once to destroy and to delay them.

Both of these purposes had the desired success. The French were so delayed by the roads, the frost, and the Cossacks, that Kutusoff was enabled to reach Krasnoi before they had left Smolensko, and thus was nearly forty miles ahead of them on the road by which they were compelled to pass. He thus fully succeeded in turning the enemy,—and Platoff and the Cossacks equally succeeded in destroying their rear whilst they retarded it. One of the successes of Kutusoff, was singular enough. A large detachment from the French conscripts was marching from Kalouga, for the purpose of reinforcing the French army, which they believed to be in that quarter. This body fell in with the advance of Kutusoff, who was coming up by the same road, and one of the divisions, under General Augereau, was compelled to lay down its arms. The main and principal success, however, was at Krasnoi, whither Kutusoff pushed forwards with all possible speed, in the hopes, and with the purpose, of reaching it before the French, and thereby turning them in their advance, and taking a station across their road. Kutusoff so far effected this purpose as to approach within a few miles of Krasnoi on the 16th of November. As his cavalry and light troops could move with more speed than the main army, and as not a moment was to be lost, Kutusoff sent them forward with General Orgeroff, himself following them with all possible speed. General Orgeroff reached his ground in time, and was immediately engaged with some part of the French coming up from Smolensko. On the following morning, the 16th, General Orgeroff was joined by the Prince Gallitzin. About the middle of this day, Marshal Davoust was seen coming up, and a battle immediately began. The whole army of Davoust was defeated with great loss and confusion. On the following day (the 17th,) Davoust was followed by Ney, who, upon reaching Krasnoi, found the enemy stationed across the road. The Russian success here was evidently more complete than on the former day, and for this reason, that the Russians had now assembled their whole army instead of their advanced detachments upon this point; and therefore had taken up such a station, and in such force, as completely to intercept Ney, and to prevent him from the possibility of breaking through.

This was the most brilliant and successful exploit performed by the Russians during the campaign. It was the complete destruction of the French rear; 12,000 men laid down their arms, and the slaughter and spoil were immense.

The Emperor Alexander seized every opportunity of animating his forces; and when fortune began to smile on their exertions, he issued the following proclamation:—

“Russians! At length the enemy of our country—the foe of its independence and freedom—has experienced a portion of that terrible vengeance which his ambitious and unprincipled aggression had aroused. From the period of his march from Wilna, his army, great in numbers, assured in valour and discipline, and elated at the remembrance of victories gained in other regions—threatened no less than the entire subjugation of the Russians. The system which we had thought fit to adopt strengthened that confidence. The sanguinary battles fought on his route, and which gave him temporary possession of Smolensk, flattered him with all the illusions of victory. He reached Moscow, and he believed himself invincible and invulnerable. He now exulted in the idea of reaping the fruit of his toils—of obtaining for his soldiers comfortable winter-quarters, and of sending out from thence, next spring, fresh forces to ravage and burn our cities, make captives of our countrymen—overthrow our laws and holy religion—and subject every thing to his lawless will. Vain, presumptuous hope!—insolent degrading menace! A population of forty millions, attached to their king and country, and devoted to their religion and laws—the least brave man of whom is superior to his unwilling confederates and victims—cannot be conquered by any heterogeneous force which he could muster, even of treble its late amount.

“Scarcely had he reached Moscow, and attempted to repose amidst its burning ruins, when he found himself encircled by the bayonets of our troops: he then, too late, discovered that the possession of Moscow was not the conquest of the kingdom—that his temerity had led him into a snare—and that he must choose between retreat or annihilation. He preferred the former; and behold the consequences.”

[Here follow the official accounts of the defeat of Victor's advanced-guard under Murat, near Moscow, by Marshal Kutusoff; of the defeat of General St. Cyr, by Marshal Wittgenstein, and the storming of Polotsk; of the re-occupation of Moscow by Winzingerode's corps, &c.]

“Russians! The Almighty has heard our wishes, and crowned your efforts with success. Every where the enemy is in motion: his disorderly movements betray his apprehensions: gladly would he compound for safety; but policy and justice alike demand the terrible infliction. The history of his daring must not be told without the terrible catastrophe by which it was attended. A hundred thousand men sacrificed to his frantic presumption attest your valour and devotion to your country, and must deter him from a repetition of his impracticable design. Much, however, yet remains to be done, and that is in your power. Let the line of his retreat be rendered memorable by your honest indignation: destroy every thing which can be of service to him, and our com-

BOOK X. manders have orders to remunerate you. Render CHAP. III. your bridges, your roads, impassable. In fine, 1812. adopt and execute the suggestions of a brave, wise, and patriotic heart, and shew yourselves deserving the thanks of your country, and your sovereign.

"Should the remains of the enemy's force escape to our imperial frontiers, and attempt to winter there, they must prepare themselves to encounter all the rigours of the clime and season, and the valorous attacks of our troops: thus harassed, exhausted, and defeated, he shall for ever be rendered incapable of renewing his presumptuous attempt.

(Signed) "ALEXANDER."

On the 15th of November he issued another proclamation, which began by stating, that no endeavours on his part could avert war. That Napoleon having collected an immense force of Austrians, &c. entered his territory with fire and sword, carrying destruction wherever he went. That cruelties heretofore unheard of, proved that he had the invasion of Russia long in contemplation. That the happiness of Russia awakened his cupidity, and inclined him to destroy her. That he hoped by flattery to seduce the Russian people, and like an overwhelming storm, penetrated into her provinces. That Europe supposed her lost; but though on all sides pressed, nothing could terrify Russians. That after repeated defeats, he sought safety in flight. That dejected, he fled from Moscow, leaving every thing behind him. That thousands of his troops daily fell sacrifices. That the enemy's strength was reduced to the lowest condition. That all classes of the state had given the most unequivocal proofs of their patriotism; and concluded by stating, that if the enemy did not meet with his utter destruction, it would lead him properly to estimate the Russian power and strength.

During this war, Bonaparte was said to have been killed no less than eighteen times, and the wags of the day asserted his life to have double the virtue of a cat's. His escape was deemed impossible; but, to the astonishment of all, he evaded the armies in pursuit of him, and returned safe to Paris. The French army was compelled to leave Smolensko because that town was found totally untenable, and because it was too far removed from that part of the country, which being still in the French possession, could in any way supply the magazines of the army. When the Emperor Napoleon left Moscow, he doubtless calculated upon making at least a short halt at Smolensko. It was necessary to assign some reason for this indispensable alteration in his plan. He therefore assigned a false one—that of the Austrians having changed the line of their operation.—The true one was, that Victor had not been able to clear the country, having been defeated or repelled in every attempt to push back General Wittgenstein.

The French bulletin made very light of the loss of men till the army reached and left Smolensko. Bonaparte had five corps with him at Moscow. These were under the commands of Davoust, Ney, Beauharnois, Poniatowski, and Junot. Besides, there were a strong corps of guards and reserve, amounting to about 45,000. The army at Moscow, therefore, was originally 140,000, which, at the time of departure, was reduced to 85,000, of these about 60,000 reached Smolensko, with the total loss of their horses and artillery. This was the first loss of the French army.

Bonaparte, with the advance of the French army, left Smolensko on the 15th, reached Krasnoi on the 16th, and left it on the following morning. This advance consisted of three corps—those of Beauharnois, Poniatowski, and Junot. Davoust followed, and had to cut his way through, which, according to the Russian reports, he did with infinite loss. Marshal Ney, with the rear-guard, was the last; and even the French bulletin acknowledged that he was intercepted by nearly the whole army of the enemy. The bulletin, however, asserted that he effected his escape by a manœuvre; but the Russians gave a much better, and a more credible account. As the French bulletin acknowledged his corps to have been intercepted by the whole army of the enemy, it must be believed, that his loss very nearly amounted to what it was stated to be in the Russian reports. The French bulletin acknowledged a ruined army and a fugitive emperor, and therefore the Russian narratives, which so represented him, were confirmed in the best possible manner, by the confession of the enemy.

Upon leaving Smolensko, Bonaparte had summoned all his corps on this side the Dwina and the Dnieper to his aid. These corps were three, those of Victor, Oudinot, and Dombrowski. Here, therefore, were about 40,000 more, to be added to the army which moved from Smolensko. Dombrowski moved up from Mohilow, by the Minsk road, and was met by the advance of Admiral Tchichigoff's army, under General Lambert, and defeated and pushed back. General Lambert marched forwards after this advantage, but was met in his turn by Oudinot, who marched down upon him on the other flank. The French bulletin asserted that Lambert was defeated; and certainly he was repelled by dint of the numerical superiority of Oudinot. The French army was thus enabled to cross the river Beresina. Half of them crossed it without interruption, but the other half were gallantly attacked by the armies of Tchichigoff and Wittgenstein; and the result was, that a complete French division (not a corps) of 2,000 men, were taken prisoners.

This is alleged, in the French bulletin, to have been occasioned by their having lost their way in the darkness of the night; but the real cause was, that the enemy intercepted them.

After having thus effected the passage of the river Beresina, the French army, instead of continuing their route upon Minsk, turned their right towards Wilna. Upon reaching this point, the Emperor Napoleon called a council of war, in which he transferred the command of the army to Murat, and immediately afterwards took his seat (like a courier) in a sledge, and, under an assumed name, fled for Paris. The manner of his arrival, indeed, was very different from what his ambitious hopes had probably anticipated, and from what the auspices of his incipient fortune seemed to promise. He who left his own kingdom, at the head of nearly 300,000 men, in all the pompous equipage and magnificent apparel of war; he who, like the heroes of old, seemed to lead victory itself as one of his household gods, was now presenting a tremendous example of the vicissitudes of human affairs;—his army was totally ruined within the short space of eight days, and he himself, a fugitive in a single car, reached his own metropolis in disguise!

BOOK X.

CHAP. III.

1812.

CHAPTER IV.

An Exchange of Prisoners rendered impracticable.—French Officers breaking Parole.—Detection of a Plan for their Escape.—Riotous Conduct of French Prisoners.—Unkind Treatment of English Prisoners.—Mysterious Death of Captain Wright.—Meeting of the New Imperial Parliament.

AN exchange of prisoners between Great Britain and France, was earnestly desired by the former country; but the sacrifices demanded by the latter, were so unprecedented in their nature as to render an adjustment impracticable. A great number of French officers, who had been prisoners, at this time took an unfair and dishonorable advantage of the confidence placed in their honor by the government of Great Britain, in order to effect their escape.

An extensive plan for liberating French prisoners on their parole was very fortunately detected. A system was established of British subjects going to five or six depôts of French prisoners, from time to time, to offer to effect the escape of such as could raise certain sums of money to defray the expences and rewards payable in England, whereby many officers were enabled to break their parole, and got safe to France, where they had been received by public officers at the ports, who paid the sums agreed upon for their sea passage. The discovery was made by the apprehension of eight officers, who left Andover the 1st of September, and were compelled by stormy weather to re-land near Christchurch, on the 12th, after having embarked from that neighbourhood in a Weymouth smuggling-boat. They had reached the coast, between Christchurch and Lymington, by the skill of their guides, without interruption; but unable to conceal themselves effectually on their re-landing, notice was given of the suspicious appearance of the parties.

On the 17th of September the French prisoners at Dartmoor depôt worked themselves up to the highest pitch of rage, at having a pound and a half of biscuit and not bread per day. The use of biscuit it should be observed, was to be discontinued as soon as the bake-house had been rebuilt; but the Frenchmen were absolutely deaf to remonstrances. A detachment of the Cheshire militia, and of the south Gloucester regiment, were drawn up on the walls surrounding the prison; and, although they had loaded their pieces with ball, the prisoners appeared undaunted, and insulted them in the grossest terms. A sentinel on duty had his bayonet wrenched off his piece, yet nobly reserved his fire: an officer, however, followed the Frenchman, struck him over the shoulder with his sword, and brought off the bayonet. The Frenchmen even bared their breasts to the troops, and seemed regardless of danger. The number of prisoners was about 7,500; and so menacing was their conduct, that an express was sent off to Plymouth-dock, at 11 o'clock at night, soliciting immediate assistance. Three pieces of artillery consequently arrived early the next morning at the principal gate, the bars of which, of immense size, had been previously broken by stones hurled against them by the insurgents: they were placed in such directions as completely to command the whole of the circle, which had the desired effect, and order was restored. It should be noticed, that the allowance of biscuit, at which these men so indignantly spurned, was precisely the same as that which was served out to the English sailors and marines.

BOOK X.

CHAP. IV.

1812.

On the other hand, the treatment of English prisoners in France was truly severe. Public indignation was justly excited by the mysterious death of Captain Wright (of the navy) of which the following is a recent account:

Captain Wright was closely imprisoned in one of those dungeons, which in the language of tyranny is called a secret; and which includes the idea of every thing most terrible to the imagination. He saw no human being but one individual, a turnkey, who visited him thrice a day. His secret was situated in a small detached square, within which was only confined an old Jesuit, about eighty years of age, a man of quality and learning. Captain Wright had his throat cut with a razor, between twelve and half-past twelve at night. About seven in the morning, the turnkey awoke all the temple with his cries, repeating over and over, "the English captain has killed himself." The gaoler came to the spot, and allowed the prisoners to see the deceased. M. D'Henoul, an advocate, who was imprisoned in the temple at the same time, entered Captain Wright's apartment in his turn, as did also 128 of his fellow-prisoners. The captain was extended on his bed, covered with blood, and the fatal razor was lying on the floor. A Moniteur of the preceding day was lying as it were very appropriately on the night-table. It contained the details of a signal victory gained by the French. "You see," said the turnkeys, who, doubtless, were well-instructed by Savary, a creature of Bonaparte's, "our victory has driven the English captain to despair." No one said a word, and no one, not even the turnkeys themselves, believed the story. It was well known, that the reading of newspapers was strictly forbidden to Captain Wright, and that he had no razor, as the barber of the temple shaved him twice a week, accompanied and superintended by one of the gaolers.

Full of horror at the shocking spectacle he had seen, the advocate went into the Jesuit's apartment, and told him, that being near the spot, and awake at midnight, (for there is little sound sleep in state prisons) he distinctly heard the door of the wicket open and then shut. He also heard some men walking in the court, as well as the opening and shutting of the door which led to the tower. M. D'Henoul confessed he was very much alarmed, as it was usually about this hour the gaolers came to extraire (that was their term when they removed a prisoner) some unfortunate being, in order to carry him before a secret military commission, and thence to a fusillade. It seems many prisoners had perished in this manner during the night. His alarm, however, subsided when he found the men he had heard were not coming his way. Curiosity induced him to put his head out of the grated window of his apartment. The assassins returned slowly at about half-past twelve, but the night being very dark, he could not count them. The wicket was opened and shut again. The Jesuit also heard the gate of his square opened; and three or four men, as he thought, came groping on their hands and feet, and opened and shut the door of the captain's chamber.

A report of the pretended suicide was drawn up and sent to London, with a Moniteur as false as the document.

It is asserted, that the assassins of Captain Wright were those very miscreants who were hired to strangle the unfortunate Pichegru.

Soon after the meeting of the new imperial parliament, (November 24,) thanks were unanimously voted to the Marquis of Wellington, in both houses, for his victory at Salamanca. In the house of lords, Earl Bathurst took a review of the proceedings of this illustrious general, from the commencement of the campaign up to the victory in question. In the house of commons, Lord Castlereagh asserted, "that, as a proof of the effect of the splendid victory at Salamanca, on the eve of the battle of Borodino, a battle as destructive as that of Eylau or of Aspern—a battle in which 80,000 men sacrificed themselves to the liberties of their country—on the eve of that battle, Prince Kutusoff animated his troops, by telling them what the English had done on the plains of Salamanca."

It was certainly gratifying to the English nation to think that a British lieutenant-general, not of old standing, had, in the course of four years, defeated and foiled seven of the most celebrated marshals of the French empire, (Junot, Soult, Ney, Mortier, Victor, Massena, and Marmont) most of them chosen successively for the very purpose of mending the fortune of their baffled predecessors, by overthrowing or circumventing him.

Lord Castlereagh also brought in a bill, pursuant to a message from the prince-regent, for further provision for Lord Wellington.

Great Britain having determined to give Russia her cordial support during her patriotic struggle with France, 50,000 stand of arms was this year sent to the Emperor Alexander, and Lords Cathcart and Walpole acted as plenipotentiaries.

CHAPTER V.

Separation of the Prussians from the French Army.—Address to the French People by Louis XVIII.—Treaty between England and Sweden.—Character and Biographical Sketch of the Crown Prince, Bernadotte.—Continental Confederacy.

AN event most fortunate for the interests of England, Russia, and Europe, occurred at the close of the Year. General d'York, the Prussian general, being pressed by the troops of General Wittgenstein, concluded with that general an armistice of neutrality, in which he conditioned, that on the one side the Prussian troops should not be attacked by the Russians, and on the other, that if the King of Prussia should refuse his ratification of the armistice and its terms, the Prussian army should not act against the Russians for two months.

As soon as this intelligence reached the King of Prussia, his majesty appeared to disavow it, by ordering the arrest of General d'York, and that he should be replaced by another general. The letter, however, from General d'York to the Duke of Tarentum, (as follows) was bold and decisive:—

"Tauroggen, Dec. 30.

"Monseigneur. After many painful marches it was not possible for me to continue them without being attacked on my flanks and rear; it was this that retarded my junction with your excellency, and left me to choose between the alternative of losing the greater part of my troops and all the materiel, which alone insures my subsistence, or saving the whole. I have thought it my duty to conclude a convention, by which the assembling of Prussian troops is to take in Eastern Prussia, which by the retreat of the French army is in the power of the Russian troops.

"The Prussian troops will form a neutral corps, and will not commit hostilities against either party. Subsequent events, the consequence of negotiations which are to take place between the belligerent powers, will decide their future fate.

"I hasten to inform your excellency of a proceeding to which I have been forced by weighty circumstances.

"Whatever may be the judgment that the world may pass on my conduct, I shall be very indifferent to it. Duty towards my troops, and the most mature deliberation dictated it; the most pure motives, whatever appearances may be, guided me in making this declaration. To you, Monseigneur, I acquit myself of obligation towards you, and beg of you to accept the assurance of the most profound respect, with which I am, &c.

(Signed)

"D'YORK."

The defection of General d'York was followed in the same spirit by another of the same kind, only under circumstances still more distressing to the Duke of Tarentum (Marshal Macdonald). General Massenbach, who had with him nearly 5,000 Prussians, was with the marshal at Tilsit, when General d'York concluded his armistice. The intelligence was immediately sent to General Massenbach, who (no doubt from previous concert) instantly quitted the French army with his division, and, repassing the Niemen, proceeded to join himself to the army and to the purpose of General d'York. This decided the fate of the Prussian army, and threw the French armies into the greatest possible distress.

This fortunate event produced its full effect in France; for a meeting of the senate was instantly called, and a senatus consultum passed for the additional levy of 350,000 men. This decree was accompanied in the French papers by a long explanation of the motives under which it had been passed, and in the language of which, the general feeling of the government, senate, and people of France, was sufficiently legible. Napoleon himself was panic-struck, this having mortified him still more severely than his previous defeat.

As Bonaparte had not only lost his army, but, what was of more consequence to him, his popularity among the French people, early in 1813, the following well-written address to the people of France was auspiciously issued by Louis XVIII.

"The moment has at length arrived, when Divine Providence appears ready to break in pieces the instrument of its wrath. The usurper of the throne of St. Louis, the devastator of Europe, experiences reverses in his turn. Shall they have no other effect but that of aggravating the calamities of France? And will she not dare to overturn an odious power, no longer protected by the illusions of victory? What prejudices, or what fears, can now prevent her from throwing herself into the arms of her king; and from recognizing, in the establishment of his legitimate authority, the only pledge of union, peace, and happiness, which his promises have so often guaranteed to his oppressed subjects?

"Being neither able, nor inclined to obtain, but by their efforts, that throne which his rights and their affection can alone confirm, what wishes should be adverse to those which he has invaria-

BOOK X.

CHAP. V.

1813.

BOOK X. bly entertained? What doubt can be started with regard to his paternal intentions?

CHAP. V.

1813.

"The king has said in his preceding declarations, and he reiterates the assurance, that the administrative and judicial bodies shall be maintained in the plenitude of their powers; that he will preserve their places to those who at present hold them, and who shall take the oath of fidelity to him; that the tribunals, depositaries of the laws, shall prohibit all prosecutions bearing relation to those unhappy times of which his return will have for ever sealed the oblivion: that, in fine, the code polluted by the name of Napoleon, but which, for the most part, contains only the ancient ordinances and customs of the realm, shall remain in force with the exception of enactments contrary to the doctrines of religion, which, as well as the liberty of the people, has long been subjected to the caprice of the tyrant.

"The senate, in which are seated some men, so justly distinguished for their talents, and whom so many services may render illustrious in the eyes of France, and of posterity,—that corps, whose utility and importance can never be duly appreciated till after the restoration,—can it fail to perceive the glorious destiny which summons it to become the first instrument of that great benefaction which will prove the most solid, as well as the most honorable guarantee of its existence and its prerogatives?

"On the subject of property, the king, who has already announced his intention to employ the most proper means for conciliating the interests of all, perceives, in the numerous settlements which have taken place between the old and the new landholders, the means of rendering those cares almost superfluous. He engages, however, to interdict all proceedings by the tribunals, contrary to such settlements,—to encourage voluntary arrangements, and, on the part of himself and family, to set the example of all those sacrifices which may contribute to the repose of France, and the sincere union of all Frenchmen.

"The king has guaranteed to the army the maintenance of the ranks, employments, pay, and appointments, which it at present enjoys. He promises also to the generals, officers, and soldiers, who shall signalize themselves in support of his cause, rewards more substantial, distinctions more honorable, than any they can receive from an usurper—always ready to disown or even to dread their services. The king binds himself anew to abolish that pernicious conscription, which destroys the happiness of families and the hope of the country.

"Such always have been, such still are, the intentions of the king. His re-establishment on the throne of his ancestors will be for France only the happy transition from the calamities of a war which tyranny perpetuates, to the blessings of a solid peace, for which foreign powers can never find any security but in the word of the legitimate sovereign. "L."

"Hartwell, Feb. 1, 1813."

A quadruple alliance between Sweden, Denmark, Russia, and England, was sought for by the British court, and General Hope, an experienced officer, was very properly chosen as a negociator, the military energy of the person employed being an earnest of the kind of aid intended by England.

A treaty was concluded between England and Sweden, but such was the peculiar situation of the crown-prince (Bernadotte) it did not justify much reasonable expectations. This Crown-prince of Sweden had two very powerful restraints to check his indignant feelings at the haughty tone of Bonaparte. He must have remembered the man to whom he was indebted for his throne; and still more, his military companions. He could not, moreover, forget that the last prince was deposed because he pushed the efforts of the country beyond its powers, and endeavoured to oppose the French armies with the single resources of Sweden. The deposed King of Sweden had exhibited no signs of madness but of extravagance; and so sensible were his people of the existence of such extravagance, and of its evil effects, that though the Swedes are characteristically the most loyal people in Europe, they quietly suffered, under this persuasion, the deposition of their prince, and replaced him, without much external violence, with his decrepid uncle as a sovereign, and with a foreign general as his designated successor. Bonaparte, who always carried his personal temper into his state transactions, had indeed treated Bernadotte with singular haughtiness, and thus diminished, as it were, his prior debt of gratitude; and having been accustomed to command Bernadotte as his French marshal, and to receive an unlimited obedience, he felt his present conduct in the nature of a military sedition.

This celebrated man, whose name will often occur in our succeeding chapters, was born on the 26th of January, 1763, at Pau, the capital of Bearn, the birth-place of the Great Henry. His father, who was a gentleman of moderate fortune, followed the profession of the law, and took care early to inspire in his son just and elevated sentiments.

Bearn, a province of France, situated to the north of the Pyrenees, has always furnished excellent soldiers. The inhabitants are well made, robust, active, courageous, sober, and lively. Agreeably to the manners of the country Bernadotte was early inured to fatigue and hardship. In winter as well as in summer he was accustomed to run about bare-headed and bare-footed with the children of the lower classes, and his favorite aliment was bread with some fruits. At the age of fifteen he eloped from his father's house, and enlisted in the regiment of royal marines, in which corps he served in the East Indies during the American war, under the orders of M. de Bussy, and with the squadron of Bailly de Suffrein. He was made a corporal a year after his enlistment, and was appointed serjeant on his return to France, in 1783. Some time after this he was made adjutant-under-officer. His regiment was then garrisoned at Marseilles, and soon after his arrival at that place the French revolution broke out, which opened, at once, a career for Bernadotte, and many others like him, wherein they might signalize their talents, and reap the reward of them. An anecdote is related of him, which shews that he could assume a requisite dignity of station. When he was serving with Bonaparte in Italy, Napoleon invited Bernadotte to dine with him, and requested him to come early. Bernadotte did so, but when he arrived, Duroc, who was then captain aid-de-camp to Bonaparte, informed Bernadotte that "General Bonaparte was busy finishing his post, and begged him to wait awhile."—Bernadotte replied, "Tell the general-in-chief that it does not suit General Bernadotte to wait in the anti-room in the army, since at Paris the directors themselves never exposed me to a similar mortification." Duroc was going to reply, when Bonaparte suddenly made his appearance, saluted Bernadotte in a smiling manner, apologised for not having come immediately, and proposed to take a walk in the garden whilst waiting for dinner. As they were going along, Bonaparte said, "I am sorry, general, that instead of sending in your name, you did not come straight into my closet. You need not doubt the pleasure I should have felt. The officer told me that two generals requested to speak to me, without giving me their names, but as soon as I heard your voice, which I know very well, I was anxious to repair the mistake. I am sorry you could suppose I had the intention to use étiquette with you, whom I consider as the right arm of the army." To this Bernadotte replied, "I am, my general, of a country where the men have as warm heads as good hearts; I have only to congratulate myself on your kindness towards me, and it was on that account I could not help expressing surprise on hearing Duroc tell me to wait."

General [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
[illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

There is another anecdote, which should be recorded, relative to the Duke d'Enghein, which did much honor to Bernadotte:—In the year 1799, the duke came secretly to Paris; Bonaparte was then in Egypt; the government was without force, and the Bourbon party hoped to regain its power. The Crown-Prince of Sweden, then General Bernadotte, was minister of war. The duke confided to him, through a common friend, his being at Paris, and offered him the post of Constable of France, if he would restore the Bourbons. "I cannot serve their cause," he replied, "but as the descendent of a hero, as a man who has placed confidence in me, no harm shall happen to him. Let the duke depart instantly—for his secret may in three days be no longer mine." The duke departed without molestation, and retired to the territory of Baden, from whence he was treacherously seized, and basely assassinated by Bonaparte, as related in Book VI. Chapter V.

The King of Prussia at length acceded, by the universal voice of his people, to the continental confederacy against Napoleon; and Denmark, on whose fidelity the French emperor depended to the last, joined in the alliance. Thus the Russian cause became strong, by their union with the Prussians, the Swedes, and the Danes. The alliance with the Swedes was particularly advantageous on account of the number of their effective troops. The accession of Austria to the allied cause, was fondly anticipated; but the Emperor of Austria, being an affectionate father, was, in consequence of the marriage of his daughter (his only child) with the Emperor of France, deterred at present from becoming his avowed enemy.

BOOK X.

CHAP. V.

1813.

CHAPTER VI.

Position of the hostile Armies in Spain, at the Commencement of the Year.—Lord Wellington's admonitory Letter to the Officers of Battalions.—Plan of the New Campaign.—Observations.—The Enemy repulsed at Bejáz.—His Escape from Alcoy.—Skirmishes.—Marshal Suchet defeated by Lieutenant-general Sir John Murray.—Lord Wellington enters Salamanca.—Splendid Victory of Vittoria.—Advance of Lord Wellington towards the Pyrenees.

BOOK X.

CHAP. VI.

1813.

FOR about four months, Lord Wellington's head-quarters were at Frenada. During his lordship's absence the enemy had not made any essential alteration in the position of the armies.

In consequence of some irregularities and offences, of which the allied army had been guilty during their late retreat, Lord Wellington addressed the following admonitory letter to the commanding officers of battalions:—

“Sir. I have ordered the army into cantonments, in which I hope that circumstances will enable me to keep them for some time, during which the troops will receive their clothing, necessaries, &c. which are already in progress, by different lines of communication, to the several divisions and brigades.

“But besides these objects, I must draw your attention, in a very particular manner, to the state of discipline of the troops. The discipline of every army, after a long and active campaign, becomes in some degree relaxed, and requires the utmost attention on the part of the general, and other officers, to bring it back to the state in which it ought to be for service; but I am concerned to have to observe, that the army under my command has fallen off, in this respect, in the late campaign, to a greater degree than any army with which I have ever served, or of which I have ever read. Yet this army has met with no disaster; it has suffered no privations, which but trifling attention on the part of the officers could not have prevented, and for which there existed no reason whatever in the nature of the service; nor has it suffered any hardships, excepting those resulting from the necessity of being exposed to the inclemencies of the weather, at a moment when they were most severe.

“It must be obvious, however, to every officer, that from the moment the troops commenced their retreat from the neighbourhood of Burgos on the one hand, and from Madrid on the other, the officers lost all command over their men. Irregularities and outrages of all descriptions were committed with impunity; and losses have been sustained which ought never to have occurred.

“Yet the necessity for retreat existing, none was ever made in which the troops made such short marches; none on which they made such long and repeated halts; and none on which the retreating armies were so little pressed on their rear by the enemy. We must look, therefore, for the existing evils, and for the situation in which we now find the army, to some cause besides those resulting from the operations in which we have been engaged.

“I have no hesitation in attributing these evils to the habitual inattentions of the officers of the regiments to their duty, as prescribed by the standing regulations of the service, and by the orders of this army.

“I am far from questioning the zeal, still less the gallantry and spirit of the officers of the army; and I am quite certain, that as their minds can be convinced of the necessity of minute and constant attention to understand, recollect, and carry into execution the orders which have been issued for the performance of their duty, and that the strict performance of this duty is necessary to enable the army to serve the country as it ought to be served, they will in future give their attention to these points.

“Unfortunately, the inexperience of the officers of the army has induced many to conceive, that the period during which an army is on service is one of relaxation from all rule, instead of being, as it is, the period during which of all others, every rule for the regulation and controul of the conduct of the soldier, for the inspection and care of his arms, ammunition, accoutrements, necessaries, and field-equipments, and his horse and horse-appointments, for the receipt and issue and care of his provisions, and the regulation of all that belongs to his food, and the forage for his horse, must be most strictly attended to by the officer of his company or troop, if it is intended that an army, a British army in particular, shall be brought into the field of battle, in a state of efficiency to meet the enemy on the day of trial.

“These are the points, then, to which I most earnestly intreat you to turn your attention, and the attention of the officers of the regiments under your command, Portuguese as well as English, during the period in which it may be in my power to leave the troops in their cantonments. The commanding officers of regiments must enforce the orders of the army, regarding the constant inspection and superintendence of the officers over the conduct of the men of their companies in their cantonments; and they must endeavour to inspire the non-commissioned officers with a sense of their situation and authority, and the non-commissioned officers must be forced to do their duty, by being constantly under the view and superintendence of the officers. By these means, the frequent and discreditable recourse to the authority of the provost, and to punishments by the sentence of courts-martial, will be prevented; and the soldiers will not dare to commit the offences and outrages, of which there are too many complaints, when they know that their officers and their non-commissioned officers have their eyes and attention turned towards them.

"The commanding officers of regiments must likewise enforce the orders of the army, regarding the constant, real inspection of the soldiers' arms, ammunition, accoutrements, and necessaries: in order to prevent, at all times, the shameful waste of ammunition, and the sale of that article, and of the soldiers' necessaries. With this view both should be inspected daily.

"In regard to the food of the soldier, I have frequently observed and lamented in the late campaign, the facility and celerity with which the French soldiers cooked, in comparison with those of our army.

"The cause of this disadvantage is the same with that of every other description,—the want of attention of the officers to the orders of the army, and to the conduct of their men; and their consequent want of authority over their conduct. Certain men of each company should be appointed to cut and bring in wood, others to fetch water, and others to get the meat, &c. to be cooked; and it would soon be found, if this practice were daily enforced, and a particular hour for seeing the dinners, and for the men dining, named as it ought to be equally as for the parade, that cooking would no longer require the inconvenient length of time which it has lately been found to take, and that the soldiers would not be exposed to the privation of their food at the moment at which the army may be engaged in operations with the enemy.

"You will of course give your attention to the field exercise and discipline of the troops. It is very desirable that the soldiers should not lose the habits of marching; and the division should march ten or twelve miles twice in each week, if the weather should permit, and the roads in the neighbourhood of the cantonments of the divisions should be dry. But I repeat, that the great object of the attention of the general and field-officers must be, to get the captains and subalterns of the regiments to understand and to perform the duties required from them, as the only mode by which the discipline and efficiency of the army can be restored, and maintained during the next campaign.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your most obedient servant,

"WELLINGTON."

"Freynada, Nov. 28, 1812.

"To —, or the officer commanding the —."

The three armies of Portugal, the centre and the south, were united in Castile, under King Joseph, whose head-quarters were at this time in Madrid. The army of Portugal was under the command of General Reille, who lately came from the army of the north, and had his head-quarters in Valladolid. The army of the centre was under the orders of Conde D'Erlon, who was formerly employed in the army of the south, and commanded for a short time the army of Portugal, after the allies retired from the Tormes. His head-quarters were in the vicinity of Madrid, and the army of the south was under Marshal Soult's orders, whose head-quarters were in Toledo. The army of the south was lately drawn towards the neighbourhood of the Tejo, having moved towards the place of Toledo the divisions of that army which were in the province of Avila, and having them replaced in Avila by the first division of the army of Portugal.

With respect to the north of Spain, General Mina was actively employed against the enemy in Navarre, and he, as well as General Longa, caused him great loss. The latter destroyed 600 men, and took two pieces of artillery, in an action with the enemy on the 30th of Nov. 1812.

About the latter end of December, the reinforcements which the English expected from Sicily had arrived, and Lieutenant-general Lord William Bentinck was expected.

The allied English and Portuguese armies occupied the same cantonments in which they were in the beginning of December. The Spanish troops were likewise all in cantonments.

In the campaign of the year 1812, the Marquis of Wellington was in the same quarters in which he was cantoned at the commencement of the year 1813, with this slight difference, that he was on the other side Ciudad Rodrigo. The campaign of 1812 began with the siege of that strong place. It is unnecessary to recal to the memory of our readers with what astonishing rapidity that fortress was taken. Upon the fall of Ciudad Rodrigo, the next step was the siege of Badajoz, and this fortress, though of thrice the strength of Ciudad Rodrigo, was taken nearly with the same rapidity. When the enemy heard of the sieges of these places, the respective armies to whose military protection they were assigned, collected their forces with all possible speed, and advanced to their relief; but before they had scarcely put themselves in march, they heard of the fall of the forts to the raising of the siege of which they were proceeding. Marmont was thus disappointed with respect to Ciudad Rodrigo, and Soult, an officer most distinguished for his alacrity and skill of all the French generals, was foiled in the same way with respect to Badajoz. Some intercepted dispatches of the latter were read in the British parliament, in which the French marshal, in the report of this affair to the minister of war at Paris, imputed the success to the incredible rapidity of Lord Wellington's movements, which had defied all previous reckoning and calculation, and therefore disappointed all his precautions. And in the last affair, that of Badajoz, the merit was the most considerably enhanced by the military reputation of the commander of Badajoz, General Philippon, who exerted all the resources of art and experience in the defence of that fortress.

BOOK X.

CHAP. VI.

1813.

It is unnecessary to proceed in this retrospect of the past campaign,—as the battle of Salamanca, the siege of Burgos, the occupation of Madrid, the relief of the cities of Cadiz, Seville, and Grenada, and the general deliverance of the southern provinces, must remain mementoes of glory to the British commander-in-chief.

Such, therefore, were the auspices under which the new campaign was to be opened. All the strongest posts on the frontier of the country to be defended were in the hands of the English. The possession of Ciudad Rodrigo secured the advance of the British army to any point, and along any line, either to the north, into Leon, or into the south, into Estremadura or Andalusia. The possession of Badajoz equally secured the offensive or defensive lines, either northerly towards Madrid, easterly into the Alentejo, or westerly towards Valencia. In a word, the Marquis of Wellington was now so happily situated at the very outset of this campaign, that he was in the centre of a circle, as it were, upon any single way of which he might move, either backwards or forwards. The best and most active part of the last campaign, was consumed in the necessary but tedious siege of the frontier towns. The new campaign began after all this work had been done, and there was nothing to delay or intercept the allied armies upon any course in which they might think proper to move.

His lordship's head-quarters were, Jan. 1813, as already mentioned, at Freynada, a town in Spain, a few miles in advance of the Portuguese frontier. From this town there are high roads to Burgos, to Toro, to Madrid, and, of course, to all the towns on the Tagus, the Guadiana, and the Guadalquivir. His lordship might have directed his course immediately for Madrid, and put himself in the situation in which he had been the preceding August, or he might have proceeded to the south, to occupy the four provinces of Andalusia, which the enemy had abandoned; Seville, Cordova, Leon, and Grenada. These provinces, which were the richest and most fertile of the Spanish monarchy, had hitherto constituted the military command of Soult; but the battle of Salamanca, and the occupation of Madrid, occasioned, very fortunately, their evacuation by the French. His lordship very wisely retained his ground, in order to act as circumstances might render most prudent.

After the enemy had retired across the Tormes, and their troops had taken up their cantonments, those on the Upper Tormes collected again on the 19th of February from Piedrahita, Congosto, El Barco, and Avila; and, on the morning of the 20th, a body of about 1,500 infantry, and 100 cavalry, under the command of the general of division, Foy, endeavoured to surprise and attacked Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill's post at Bejar, consisting of the 50th regiment, and 6th Portuguese caçadores, which troops were under the command of Lieutenant-colonel Harrison, of the 50th. The surprise did not succeed, and the enemy were repulsed with loss, and were pursued for some distance by the 6th caçadores, under Major Mitchell.

On the 26th of February his lordship took the command of the division of the Mediterranean army, serving on the coast of Spain.

On the 3d of March, when reconnoitring the position of Alcoy, it became necessary to drive in the advanced posts. The enemy lost in the action, one officer killed, and about twenty men killed and wounded.

The possession of Alcoy appeared of importance; and having had a very accurate view of the position, Lord Wellington thought it possible, in carrying the place, to cut off the corps stationed there. With this intention, on the 6th, his lordship directed the march of a part of the army on Alcoy, and attacked that post on the morning of the 7th; but by the unfortunate delay of the column which was destined to cut off his retreat, the enemy effected his escape: had this column arrived a quarter of an hour before, not a man could have got off. The advanced-guard of the column destined to attack the enemy in front, drove him about six or seven miles, when the soldiers were so much fatigued, that his lordship pressed them no further. The country over which the enemy retired was extremely favorable for him, and certainly might have been much better defended. He was on this account enabled to dispose of his killed and wounded, and his loss was not ascertained. That on the part of the allied army was inconsiderable.

In consequence of Alcoy being occupied by a strong division of the allied army, Marshal Suchet quitted Valencia, and assumed the command, in person, of the troops on the right bank of the Xucar. He drew to this division of his army nearly all the disposable force which he had in the neighbourhood of Valencia.

Finding that the enemy was concentrating his force, Lord Wellington assembled the allied army at Castella on the 20th. In consequence of this concentration of the allied army, Marshal Suchet reinforced his right, and had a strong force at Onteniente, Mogente, and Fuente del Higuera. Some trifling skirmishes took place with the enemy. General Whittingham forced him to retire beyond the Puerto de Albayda, with a very considerable loss. The Spanish troops behaved with great gallantry and order. General Whittingham, who conducted this affair with great judgment, was slightly wounded, as were an officer and seven men.

In a reconnoitring party on the same day, conducted by Major-general Donkin, Captain Jacks, and the foreign troops of light cavalry, Captain Waldron, and the grenadiers of the 2d, 27th, and Lieutenant M'Dougall, of the adjutant-general's department, had an opportunity of making a spirited attack on an enemy's post, which was carried in the presence of a battalion drawn up as spectators. No loss was sustained on this occasion; but some of the enemy were killed, and a few taken prisoners.

On the 13th of April, the allied army, under the command of Lieutenant-general Sir John Murray, Bart. defeated the enemy, commanded by Marshal Suchet in person. The following was Sir John Murray's account of this battle:—

"It appears that the French general had, for the purpose of attacking this army, for some time been employed in collecting his whole disposable force. His arrangements were completed on the 10th, and in the morning of the 11th he attacked and dislodged, with some loss, a Spanish corps, posted by General Elio, at Yecla, which threatened his right, whilst it supported our left flank. In the evening he advanced in considerable force to Villena, and I am sorry to say, that he captured, on the morning of the 12th, a Spanish garrison, which had been thrown into the castle by the Spanish general, for its defence. On the 12th, about noon, Marshal Suchet began his attack on the advance of this army, posted at Biar, under the command of Colonel Adam. Colonel Adam's orders were to fall back upon Castalla, but to dispute the passage with the enemy; which he did with the utmost gallantry and skill, for five hours, though attacked by a force infinitely superior to that which he commanded. The enemy's advance occupied the pass that evening, and Col. Adam took up the ground in our position which had been allotted to him. On the 13th at noon, the enemy's columns of attack were formed; composed of three divisions of infantry, a corps of cavalry, of about 1,600 men, and a formidable train of artillery. The position of the allied army was extensive. The left was posted on a strong range of hills, occupied by Major-general Whittingham's division of Spanish troops, and the advance of the allied army under Colonel Adam. This range of hills terminates at Castalla, which, and the ground to the right, was occupied by Major-general Mackenzie's division, and the 58th regiment, from that of Lieutenant-general Clinton. The remainder of the position was covered by a strong ravine, behind which Lieutenant-general Clinton was stationed, supported by three battalions of General Roche's division, as a column of reserve. A few batteries had been constructed in this part of the line, and in front of the castle of Castalla. The enemy necessarily advanced on the left of the position. The first movement he made, was to pass a strong body of cavalry along the line threatening our right, which was refused. Of this movement no notice was taken: the ground to which he was pointing is unfavorable to cavalry, and as this movement was foreseen, the necessary precautions had been taken. When this body of cavalry had passed nearly the half of our line of infantry, Marshal Suchet advanced his columns to the foot of the hills; and certainly his troops, with a degree of gallantry that entitles them to the highest praise, stormed the whole line, which is not less than two miles and a half in extent. But, gallantly as the attack was made, the defence of the heights was no less brilliant: at every point the enemy was repulsed—at many with the bayonet. He suffered a very severe loss; our gallant troops pursued him for some distance, and drove him, after a severe struggle, with precipitation, on his battalions of reserve upon the plain. The cavalry, which had slowly advanced along our right, gradually fell back to the infantry. At present his superiority in that arm enabled him to venture this movement, which otherwise he should have severely repented.

"Having united his shattered battalions with those which he kept in reserve, Marshal Suchet took up a position in the valley; but which it would not have been creditable to allow him to retain. I therefore decided on quitting mine, still, however, retaining the heights, and formed the allied army in his front, covering my right flank with the cavalry, whilst the left rested on the hills. The army advanced in two lines to attack him, a considerable distance; but, unfortunately, Marshal Suchet did not choose to risk a second action, with the defile in his rear. The line of the allies was scarcely formed when he began his retreat; and we could effect nothing more than driving the French into the pass with defeat, which they had exultingly passed in the morning. The action terminated at dusk, with a distant but heavy cannonade. I am sorry to say, that I have no trophies to boast of. The enemy took no guns to the heights, and he retired too expeditiously to enable me to reach him. Those which he used in the latter part of the day, were posted in the gorge of the defile, and it would have cost us the lives of many brave men to take them.

BOOK X.
CHAP. VI.
1813.

"In the dusk, the allied army returned to its position at Castalla, after the enemy had retired to Biar. From thence he continued his retreat at midnight to Villena, which he quitted again this morning in great haste, directing his march upon Fuente de la Higuera and Onteniente. But although I have taken no cannon from the enemy, in point of numbers his army is very considerably crippled; and the defeat of a French army, which boasted it had never known a check, cannot fail, I should hope, in producing a most favorable effect in this part of the Peninsula. As I before mentioned, Marshal Suchet commanded in person. The Generals Harispe, Habert, and Robert, commanded their respective divisions. I hear, from all quarters, that General Harispe is killed; and I believe, from every account that I can collect, that the loss of the enemy amounts fully to 3,000 men, and he admits 2,500. Upwards of 800 have already been buried in front of only one part of our line; and we know that he has carried off with him an immense number of wounded. We had no opportunity of making prisoners, except such as were wounded, the numbers of which had not yet reached me.

"This action has not cost us the lives of many of our comrades. Deeply must be felt the loss, however trifling, of such brave and gallant soldiers, but we know it is inevitable; and I can with truth affirm, there was not an officer or soldier engaged who did not court the glorious termination of an honorable life, in the discharge of his duty to his king and to his country. The gallant and judicious conduct of those that were engaged, deprived much more than one half the army of sharing in the perils and glory of the day; but the steady countenance with which the divisions of Generals Clinton and Mackenzie remained for some hours under a cannonade, and the eagerness and alacrity with which the lines of attack were formed, sufficiently proved to me what I had to depend on from them, had Marshal Suchet awaited the attack.

"I cannot sufficiently praise the judicious arrangements which Col. Adam, who commanded the advance, made, and the ability with which he executed his orders on the 12th instant. The advance consists only of the second battalion of the 27th regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Reeves; the 1st Italian regiment, commanded by Lieut.-colonel Burke; the Calabrian free corps, commanded by Major Carey; one rifle company of the 3d and 8th battalions King's German Legion, commanded by Captains Leuder and Brauns of those corps; and a troop of foreign hussars, under the orders of Captain Jacks, of the 20th dragoons, with four mountain guns, in charge of Captain Arabin, royal artillery. The enemy attacked this corps with from 5 to 6,000 men, and for five hours (and then only in consequence of order) succeeded in possessing himself of the pass. The conduct of all engaged in this brilliant affair merits, and has met with, my highest approbation. Colonel Adam was wounded very early in the attack, but continued, and still continues, in charge of his division. On the 13th, the attack of the enemy on Colonel Adam's division was very severe, but the enemy was defeated at every point, and a most gallant charge of the 2d and 27th, led by Colonel Adam and Lieutenant-colonel Reeves, decided the fate of the day, at that part of the field of battle.

"The skill, judgment, and gallantry displayed by Major-general Whittingham and his division of the Spanish army, rivals, though it cannot surpass, the conduct of Colonel Adam and the advance. At every point the enemy was repulsed—at many, at the point of the bayonet. At one point, in particular, where a French grenadier battalion had gained the summit of the hill, but was charged and driven from the heights by a corps under the command of Col. Casans. Major-general Whittingham highly applauds the conduct of Col. Casans, Col. Romero, Col. Campbell, Col. Casteras, and Lieut.-col. Ochoa, who commanded at various points of the hills. To the chief of his staff, Colonel Serrano, he likewise expresses himself to be equally obliged on this, as well as many other occasions; and he acknowledges, with gratitude, the services of Colonel Catinelli, of the staff of the Italian levy, who was attached to him during the day.

"It now only remains for me to acknowledge the cordial co-operation and support I have met with from the several general officers and brigadiers, as well as from the various officers in charge of departments attached to this army. To Major-general Donkin, quarter-master-general, I am particularly indebted, for the zeal and ability with which he conducts the duties of his extensive department, and the gallantry he displays on every occasion. Major Kenah, who is at the head of the adjutant-general's department, affords me every satisfaction. Lieutenant-colonel Holcombe, and, under his orders, Major Williamson, conduct the artillery branch of the service in a manner highly creditable. The different brigades of guns, under Captains Lacy, Thomson, and Gilmour, (and Garcia, of the Sicilian army) and Lieutenant Patton, of the flying artillery, were extremely useful, and most gallantly served; and the Portuguese artillery supported the reputation their countrymen have acquired.

"The army is now in march. I proceed to Alcoy, in the hope, but not the sanguine hope, that I may be enabled to force the Albayda Pass, and reach the entrenched position of the enemy of San Felipe, before he can arrive there. I consider this movement as promising greater advantages than a direct pursuit, as the road which he has chosen being very favorable for cavalry, in which arm he is so much superior, I should probably be delayed too long to strike any blow of importance."

On the 14th of May, the plan of operations was varied, and a great force of English infantry, cavalry, and artillery, passed the Douro by a magnificent bridge of boats, placed at Torremarano: the object was to attack the enemy's left flank, and oblige him to abandon the Douro. Silveira arrived on the 13th, with his division of 5,000 men, at Sierra de Gata, and had his head-quarters at Trivegos. The following was the plan of operations laid down by Lord Wellington for the ensuing campaign:—The combined army was to be divided into three columns, of which the right, supposing the front, at the outset, to extend from north to south along the confines of Portugal and Spain, was to advance along the line of the Tagus to Toledo, where it was proposed that it should form a junction with the army of Alicant, under Sir John Murray. This column to consist of the second division of the grand army, under Sir Rowland Hill.

The second, or centre column, consisting of the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and light divisions, to be under the immediate command of the Marquis of Wellington, who would advance by way of Salamanca. The immediate object of this corps, which comprised the main strength of the army, was to drive the enemy from his positions on the right bank of the Douro, if he should attempt to maintain them.

The third column, forming the left, consisting of the first, third, and fifth divisions, under the command of Sir Thomas Graham, was to march at first directly northward within the Portuguese frontier, through the province of Trallos Montes to Braganza, whence it was to enter Spain, turning the French corps on the Douro, and hastening their retreat, if they should not have retired previously. Sir Thomas Graham would then take the line of Benevente to Burgos. The siege of that fortress would be formed in further prosecution of the plan, when Lord Wellington, with such further part of the army as it might be found necessary to carry so far northward, should have arrived on the Ebro; on the course of which river, and in the strong places behind it, the principal resistance of the enemy was expected.

A considerable part of the British force was to be left in Madrid, where the central depôt was to be established; the principal depôts were, however, to remain as usual, at Ciudad Rodrigo and Almeida.

On the 26th Lord Wellington entered Salamanca (the scene of his late victory) at full gallop, at the head of a regiment of hussars. Villat had retreated in part, but Lord Wellington came up with his rear. The town was not in the least injured by the French while they were the occupiers.

The victory of Vittoria, June 21, which was obtained by the allied army, was considered as one of the most complete and decisive that had ever been recorded. The following was Lord Wellington's account of this splendid achievement, which occasioned every possible demonstration of enthusiasm and exultation among his countrymen.

"The enemy's army, commanded by Joseph Bonaparte, having Marshal Jourdan as the major-general of the army, took up a position, on the night of the 19th, in front of Vittoria, the left of which rested upon the heights which end at Puebla de Arlanzon, and extended from thence across the valley of Zadora, in front of the village of Arunez. They occupied, with the right of the centre, a height which commanded the valley of Zadora, and the right of their army was stationed near Vittoria, and was destined to defend the passage of the river Zadora, in the neighbourhood of that city. They had a reserve, in rear of their left, in the village of Gomecha.

"The nature of the country through which the army had passed since it had reached the Ebro, had necessarily extended our columns, and we halted on the 20th, in order to close them up, and moved the left to Margina, where it was most likely it would be necessary: I reconnoitred the enemy's position on that day, with a view to the attack to be made on the following morning, if they should still remain in it.

"We accordingly attacked the enemy on the 21st, and the allied army, under my command, gained a complete victory; having driven them from all their positions, having taken from them 151 pieces of cannon, 415 waggons of ammunition, and all their baggage, provisions, cattle, treasure, &c. and a considerable number of prisoners.

"The operations of the day commenced by Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill obtaining possession of the heights of La Puebla, on which the enemy's left rested, which heights they had not occupied in great strength. He detached on this service one brigade of the Spanish division, under General Murille; the other brigade being employed in keeping the communication between his main body, on the high road from Miranda to Vittoria, and the troops detached to the heights. The enemy, however, soon discovered the importance of the heights, and reinforced their troops there to such an extent, as that Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill was obliged to detach, first,

BOOK X.

CHAP. VI.

1812.

BOOK X.

CHAP. VI.

1813.

the 71st regiment, and the light infantry battalion of Major-general Walker's brigade, under the command of the Honorable Lieutenant-colonel Cadogan, and successively other troops to the same point; and the allies not only gained, but maintained possession of these important heights throughout their operations, notwithstanding all the efforts of the enemy to retake them. The contest here, however, was very severe, and the loss sustained considerable. General Murillo was wounded, but remained in the field; and the Honorable Lieutenant-colonel Cadogan died of a wound which he received.

"Under cover of the possession of these heights, Sir Rowland Hill successively passed the Zadora, at La Puebla and the defile formed by the heights and the river Zadora, and attacked and gained possession of the village of Sabijana de Alava, in front of the enemy's line, which the enemy made repeated attempts to regain.

"The difficult nature of the country prevented the communication between our different columns moving to the attack from their stations on the river Bayas at as early an hour as I had expected, and it was late before I knew that the column composed of the third and seventh divisions, under the command of the Earl of Dalhousie, had arrived at the station appointed for them.

"The fourth and light divisions, however, passed the Zadora immediately after Sir Rowland Hill had possession of Sabijana de Alava, the former at the bridge of Nanclaus, and the latter at the bridge of Tres Puentes, and almost as soon as these had crossed, the column under the Earl of Dalhousie arrived at Mendonza, and the third division, under Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Picton, crossed at the bridge higher up, followed by the seventh division, under the Earl of Dalhousie.

"These four divisions, forming the centre of the army, were destined to attack the heights on which the right of the enemy's centre was placed, while Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill should move forward from Sabijana de Alava to attack the left; the enemy, however, having weakened his line, to strengthen his detachment in the hills, abandoned his position in the valley, as soon as he saw our disposition to attack it, and commenced his retreat in good order towards Vittoria.

"Our troops continued to advance in admirable order, notwithstanding the difficulty of the ground.

"In the mean time, Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Graham, who commanded the left of the army, consisting of the first and fifth divisions, and Generals Pack's and Bradford's brigades of infantry, and Generals Bock's and Anson's brigades of cavalry, and who had been moved on the 20th to Margina, moved forward from thence on Vittoria, by the high road from that town to Bilboa. He had besides with him the Spanish division under Colonel Longa, and General Giron, who had been detached to the left under a different view of the state of affairs, and had afterwards been re-called, and had arrived on the 20th at Orduna, marched that morning from thence, so as to be in the field in readiness to support Lieutenant-general Sir T. Graham, if his support had been required.

"The enemy had a division of infantry and some cavalry advanced on the great road from Vittoria to Bilboa, resting their right on some strong heights covering the village of Gamarra Major. Both Gamarra and Abechuco were strongly occupied, as têtes-de-pont of the bridges over the Zadora at these places. Brigadier-general Pack, with his Portuguese brigade, and Colonel Longa, with the Spanish division, were directed to turn and gain the heights, supported by Major-general Anson's brigade of light dragoons, and the fifth division of infantry, under the command of Major-general Oswald, who was desired to take the command of all these troops.

"Lieutenant-general Sir T. Graham reports, that in the execution of this service, the Portuguese and Spanish troops behaved admirably. The fourth and eighth caçadores particularly distinguished themselves. Colonel Longa being on the left, took possession of Gamarra Minor.

"As soon as the heights were in our possession, the village of Gamarra Major was most gallantly stormed and carried by Brigadier-general Robinson's brigade of the fifth division, which advanced in columns of battalions, under a very heavy fire of artillery and musketry, without firing a shot, assisted by two guns of Major Lawson's brigade of artillery. The enemy suffered severely, and lost three pieces of cannon.

"The lieutenant-general then proceeded to attack the village of Abochuco, with the first division, by forming a strong battery against it, consisting of Captain Dubourdieu's brigade and Captain Ramsey's troop of horse-artillery; and, under cover of this fire, Colonel Halkett's brigade advanced to the attack of the village, which was carried, the light battalion having charged and taken three guns and a howitzer on the bridge: this attack was supported by General Bradford's brigade of Portuguese infantry.

"During the operation at Abochuco, the enemy made the greatest efforts to repossess themselves of the village of Gamarra Major, which were gallantly repulsed by the troops of the fifth division, under the command of Major-general Oswald. The enemy had, however, on the heights on the left of the Zadora, two divisions of reserve, and it was impossible to cross by the bridges till the troops which had moved upon the enemy's centre and left had driven them through Vittoria. The whole then co-operated in the pursuit, which was continued by all till after it was dark.

"The movement of the troops under Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Graham, and their possession of Gamarra and Abechuco, intercepted the enemy's retreat by the high road to France. They were then obliged to turn to the road towards Pamplona; but they were unable to hold any position for a sufficient length of time to allow their baggage and artillery to be drawn off. The whole therefore of the latter, which had not already been taken by the troops in their attack of the successive positions, occupied by the enemy in their retreat from their first position on Arunez and on the Zadora, and all their ammunition and baggage, and every thing they had, were taken close to Vittoria. I have reason to believe that the enemy carried off with them one gun and one howitzer only.

"The army under Joseph Bonaparte consisted of the whole of the armies of the south and of the centre, and of four divisions, and all the cavalry of the army of Portugal, and some troops of the army of the north. General Foix's division of the army of Portugal was in the neighbourhood of Bilboa; and General Clausel, who commands the army of the north, was near Logrono, with one division of the army of Portugal, commanded by General Topin, and General Vandermasen's division of the army of the north.

"The sixth division of the allied army, under Major-general the Honorable Edward Pakenham, was likewise absent, having been detained at Medina del Pomar for three days, to cover the march of our magazines and stores.

"I cannot extol too highly the good conduct of all the general-officers, officers, and soldiers of the army in this action. Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill speaks highly of the conduct of General Murillo, and the Spanish troops under his command; and of that of Lieutenant-general the Honorable W. Stewart, and the Comde d'Amarante, who commanded divisions of infantry under his directions. He likewise mentions the conduct of the Honorable Lieutenant-colonel O'Callagan, who maintained the village of Sabijana de Alava against all the efforts of the enemy to regain possession of it; and that of Lieutenant-colonel Brooke, of the adjutant-general's department; and Lieutenant-colonel the Honorable Alexander Abercromby, of the quarter-master-general's department.

"It was impossible for the movements of any troops to be conducted with more spirit and regularity than those of the respective divisions of Lieutenant-general the Earl of Dalhousie, Sir Thomas Picton, Sir Lowry Cole, and Major-general Charles Baron Alten. These troops advanced in echelons of regiments, in two, and occasionally three lines; and the Portuguese troops, in the third and fourth divisions, under the command of Brigadier-general Power and Colonel Stubbs, led the march with a steadiness and gallantry never surpassed on any occasion.

"Major-general the Hon. C. Colville's brigade, of the third division, was seriously attacked, in its advance, by a very superior force, well formed; which it drove in, supported by General Inglis's brigade of the seventh division, commanded by Colonel Grant, of the 82d. These officers, and the troops under their command, distinguished themselves.

"Major-general Vandeleur's brigade of the light division was, during the advance upon Vittoria, detached to the support of the seventh division; and Lieutenant-general the Earl of Dalhousie has reported most favorably of its conduct.

"Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Graham particularly reports his sense of the assistance he received from Colonel Delancy, deputy-quarter-master-general, and from Lieutenant-colonel Bouverie, of the adjutant-general's department, and from the officers of his personal staff; and from the Honorable Lieutenant-colonel Upton, assistant-quarter-master-general, and Major Hope, assistant-adjutant, with the first division; and Major-general Oswald reports the same of Lieutenant-colonel Berkeley, of the adjutant-general's department, and Lieutenant-colonel Gomm, of the quarter-master-general's department.

"I am particularly indebted to Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Graham, and Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill, for the manner in which they have respectively conducted the service entrusted to them since the commencement of the operations, which have ended in the battle of the 21st, and for their conduct in that battle; as likewise to Marshal Sir William Beresford, for the friendly advice and assistance which I have received from him upon all occasions during the late operations.

"I must not omit to mention, likewise, the conduct of General Giron, who commands the Galician army, who made a forced march from Oroduna, and was actually on the ground in readiness to support Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Graham.

"The Quarter-master-general, Major-general George Murray, in the late operations, and in the battle of the 21st, gave me the greatest assistance. I am likewise indebted much to Lord Aylmer, the deputy-adjutant-general, and to the officers of the adjutant and quarter-master-general's departments respectively, and to Lieutenant-colonel Lord Fitzroy Somerset, Lieutenant-colonel Campbell, and the officers of my personal staff; and to Lieutenant-colonel Sir Richard Fletcher, and the officers of the royal engineers.

"Colonel his serene highness the hereditary Prince of Orange was in the field as my aide-de-camp, and conducted himself with his usual gallantry and intelligence.

BOOK X.

CHAP. VI.

1812.

"Mareschal-del-campo Don Louis Wimpfen, and the Inspector-general Don Thomas O'Donnoju, and the officers of the staff of the Spanish army, have invariably rendered me every assistance in their power in the course of these operations; and I avail myself of this opportunity of expressing my satisfaction at their conduct, as likewise with that of Mareschal-del-campo Don Miguel de Alava, and of Brigadier-general Don Joseph O'Lawlor, who have been so long and so usefully employed with me.

"The artillery was most judiciously placed by Lieutenant-colonel Dickson, and was well served, and the army is particularly indebted to that corps.

"The nature of the ground did not allow of the cavalry being generally engaged; but the general officers, commanding the several brigades, kept the troops under their command respectively close to the infantry to support them, and they were most active in the pursuit of the enemy after they had been driven through Vittoria."

The forward movements of Lord Wellington equally astonished his friends and enemies; in fact, his lordship, astonished his most sanguine partizans. It was anticipated by every one of them, in the first place, that the French would have made a stand upon the Douro; and that having possessed themselves, and strongly garrisoned the towns of Toro, Zamora, Tordesillas, and Valladolid, they would not have abandoned such strong ground without some struggle. It became a matter, therefore, of some interest, to inquire by what means the Marquis had at length effected, without difficulty, what it was the vain labour of the greatest part of the last campaign to attempt.

The first consideration is, What was the situation of the French upon the opening of the campaign? It was briefly as follows: The French corps were all assembled and concentrated upon the line of the Douro, between Zamora and Valladolid; that is to say, they possessed all the strong points on the northern bank of that river. This bank, according to the report of the engineers, is rough and precipitous, and commands all the lower ground of the opposite bank. It was generally considered, therefore, that it was the purpose of the French to make their stand upon this high ground; and it certainly would have been a point of very great difficulty to have forced it. The marquis, therefore, with a very prudent dexterity, endeavoured to elude the necessity of this laborious and perilous effort; and with these intentions, instead of crossing the river directly opposite to the enemy, he marched higher up towards its mouth, and crossed it in Portugal. By these means he at once surprised the enemy, and compelled them to withdraw. The marquis presented himself on a road where no one expected him, and therefore found no opposition to his advance. On the contrary, as he was upon the rear of the enemy, they were compelled hastily to abandon all the positions which they had been so long in fortifying. This was the first advantage.

The next consideration is, what was the subsequent line of operation adopted, and evidently intended, by the Marquis Wellington. Having thus passed the Douro, and eluded the necessity of forcing the strong ground on the northern bank of that river, the marquis pursued the same course of operation with respect to the next river upon his road of advance. He crossed the Ebro as he had crossed the Douro. Instead of forcing a passage, he eluded, by the exertion of his masterly skill, the necessity of forcing it, and effected the passage over it with as much ease, and as little opposition, as if he had passed the Tagus in Portugal. It was by these means, therefore, which appeared very simple after the thing was done, but which no one would have thought of, till they had been instructed in the event—it was by these means that the Marquis Wellington effected an operation which must be considered as one of the most splendid in the whole history of the war, and which will not sink in comparison with the best-imagined and best-executed manœuvre of modern times.

The Marquis of Wellington received, for this victory, the unanimous thanks of both houses of parliament; and the glorious results of it were thus, in a short but emphatic compass, recorded in the Corunna papers, dated July 4:—

Valencia is evacuated!—Pamplona besieged!—Barcelona invested!—Tarragona taken!—Wellington marching to cut off Suchet!—and the British flag unfurled in France!!!

Field-marshal Wellington's head-quarters were, before this battle, at Orcayen, not far to the south-east of Pamplona, in which place a garrison of 1,200 men was closely besieged. The hero was proceeding to Jaca, in order to intercept Suchet, and thus clear the Peninsula of the only remaining force in the country, which retained any thing like the appearance or consistency of an army. Jaca is the capital of a district in Arragon, and about forty-five miles from the renowned city of Saragossa, in a direction almost due north; so that the allied army marched from Pamplona across the country, almost parallel with the Pyrenees.

CHAPTER VII.

State of Russia.—Description of Bonaparte's Person advertised.—The Emperor Alexander arrives at Wilna.—Battle of Posen.—The Russians enter Berlin.—Their Advance towards Hamburgh.—Insurrection against the French.—The Russians enter Hamburgh.—The King of Prussia enters into a Treaty with the Emperor Alexander.

THE separation of 30,000 Prussians from the French army, in consequence of the treaty of D'York with the Russians, (mentioned in chap. 5,) rendered the latter formidable enemies to Bonaparte at the commencement of the year.

It has been intimated in our third chapter, that the Emperor Alexander endeavoured to prevent the escape of the enemy, and great expectations were entertained by the Russians of taking Bonaparte prisoner, as appears by the following orders and description of his person:

"It is hereby commanded, to all the generals of corps, all the chiefs of Cossack regiments, and also, all the partisans who act round the remains of the French grand army, under the orders of the Emperor Napoleon in person, to redouble their activity and attention in the execution of their duty, that nothing may escape of the ruins of that army. After the immense losses which it has sustained for more than six weeks, during which our light troops have taken from one to six thousand men a day; after having seen a great part of their cavalry destroyed; and, above all, after the glorious day of the 6th (18th) of this month, when General Benningsen completely defeated the King of Naples, with a loss of a part of his artillery, and such ruin to his cavalry, that it has since never dared to shew itself before us; it would be a shame to our army and our light troops, if a single man of the enemy was ever to return to France, and not pay with his life or his captivity, the guilty insolence of having dared to follow, into the heart of the Russian provinces, that black aggressor who makes a sport of the blood of his people. The reinforcements of cavalry that have lately come up, amount to 20,000 men, among whom are twenty-six regiments of Cossacks of the Don, who every day take a number of pieces of cannon from the rear of the enemy, which weakened, harassed, and worn down, is now reduced to the most deplorable situation, and employs all its efforts to evade our vigilance and escape our attacks. With these decided advantages, we repeat, that no Frenchman should ever see his country again; but we lay it more than all upon the responsibility of the commanders and chiefs of the Cossack regiments, and on all our detached parties, so to watch round the French army, that the Emperor Napoleon may not personally escape. For this purpose, we add his description to this order of the day. This description is equally to be acted upon by all the chiefs of districts, all authorities, civil or military, all post-masters, &c. If this order is strictly executed, artillery, ammunition, equipage, every thing must fall into our hands. We shall also recover, as we have already done in part, the consecrated spoils which this sacrilegious profaner, renewing the Vandalism of the revolution, has plundered from our temples.

"Description of his Majesty the Emperor Napoleon.

"The figure short and compact,—the hair black, flat, and short,—the beard black and strong, shaved up towards the ear,—the eyebrows strongly arched, but contracted towards the nose,—the nose aqueline, with perpetual marks of snuff,—the countenance gloomy and violent,—the chin extremely projecting,—always in a little uniform without ornaments,—generally wrapped in a little grey surtout, to avoid being remarked,—and continually attended by a Mameluke."

After the disastrous retreat of Bonaparte, the Russians captured 41 generals, 1,298 officers, 167,510 non-commissioned officers and soldiers, and 1,131 pieces of cannon.

The fate of Wilna was happily decided by the hasty flight of the trembling invaders. On the 1st of January, (new style,) the Russian guards entered the city, under the command of his imperial highness the czarewitch and grand duke, and universal joy prevailed. The presence of the Emperor Alexander increased this satisfaction. His imperial majesty was met seventy wersts from Wilna, at the village of Michalischek, by the field-post inspector, Doliwa Dobrowolskij, and at the last station from hence, at the village Jaswa, by Colonel Tschernosubow, with a regiment of Cossacks, amid the joyful acclamations of a great concourse of people, who had arrived from every quarter, and who accompanied him to this city. At the same station, the Jewish congregation of Wilna had likewise the happiness of welcoming his majesty, with bread and salt, amid the shouts of "Long live the great monarch, Alexander the First."

On entering the city, his majesty was received by Major-general Strawkow, and Lieutenant-

BOOK X.

CHAP. VII.

1813.

BOOK X.

CHAP. VII.

1813.

general Oertel; and at the palace of the general field-marshal, by the whole of the general officers. In the evening the city was illuminated. Early in the morning of his majesty's birth-day, he was pleased to attend the parade of the guards, and after returning to the palace, he received the congratulations of the military and civil officers. When his majesty went to the church to hear the holy liturgy, the town-corps of the city, with their colours, stood before the palace; and when the colours saluted, a joyful hurrah ensued. The dinner-table for his majesty was, on this solemn day, laid at the house of the field-marshal-general, with whom it pleased his majesty to spend the evening. Whilst the cannon were firing during dinner-time, joyful exclamations and hurrahs intermingled with the thunder of the artillery throughout the city. The inhabitants embraced each other, as in the holy Easter feast, and loudly expressed their heartfelt joy. In the evening, this general solemnity was concluded with several illuminations. In the theatre, before the close of the piece, a transparent picture of his majesty was placed in view, before which, the happy people, singing solemn songs with great feeling, expressed their grateful thanks for the delivery of this part of the country.

His imperial majesty, on his arrival at Wilna, was pleased to appoint General Field-marshal Prince Golenistchew Kutusoff, of Smolensk, a knight of the first class, and grand cross of the military order of St. George the martyr and bringer of victory.

For the defence of his empire, his majesty had enjoined, by proclamation:

1. That there shall be a general levy throughout the empire of eight men in every 500.
2. That the governments of Pultowa, Chernigoff, Courland, Wilna, Grodno, Minsk, Bialystok, Tarnopol, and Georgia, be exempted.
3. That Siberia shall have a separate regulation.
4. That the land-owners and citizens who have furnished men to the militia, shall be exempted from this levy.
5. That the levy shall be commenced in each government within two weeks, and ended within four, from the publication of this order.

After the arrival of the Russian forces at Konigsberg, the fortress of Pillage was summoned by them in such a manner, January 28, as to prevent all communication from the outside. The enemy endeavoured to send off a considerable quantity of ammunition from thence to Dantzic, but was prevented by the Russian detachments. A convoy of provisions, which was going to Dantzic, was likewise taken, together with its escort, consisting of one company.

On the 29th, Adjutant-general Massiltschikow, with his detachment, took possession of Ostro-linska; and Count Michael Worenzow took Bromberg, with its valuable magazines.

On the 2d of February, a detachment of Cossacks, which preceded the columns of the grand army, and marched before the van-guard, entered Plozk, and immediately passed the Visula, in further pursuit of the enemy.

A considerable magazine was found at Plozk, in which, among other things, were 500 korez of oats, 6,000 centners of flour, 800 barrels of salt, &c. &c. A party detached by Adjutant-general Baron Winzingerode had taken possession of Kowaki, and there found a small magazine established by the enemy.

After a sanguinary battle on the 18th, near Posen, in which the French were defeated, 19,000 Russians entered Berlin on the 20th. The procession began about 10 in the morning. His royal highness Prince Henry of Prussia rode by the side of his excellency the general of cavalry, Count Wittgenstein, attended by a great number of Russian and Prussian generals, a regiment of dragoons, two regiments of infantry, and several batteries of artillery, of twelve pieces each, in the whole, forty-eight pieces of artillery, with ninety-six powder-waggon, martial music playing the whole time, and the spectators waving their hats and handkerchiefs, with a continual hurrah in honor of the Emperor Alexander, which was answered by the Russians with shouts of "Long live Frederick William!" In the afternoon Prince Henry of Prussia gave a grand dinner to Prince Wittgenstein, Prince Repnin, general and military governor of this capital, and a great number of other Russian generals and officers. His excellency afterwards went to the opera; and at night the whole city was voluntarily illuminated.

The next day his excellency Count Wittgenstein caused the following acknowledgment to be inserted in the public gazettes of this city:—

"By the enthusiasm with which the inhabitants of Berlin have received the imperial Russian troops; by the affection and high respect which they have on this occasion expressed for his majesty the emperor, my master; by the esteem and gratitude with which they have treated the troops, whom they consider as their deliverers from an insupportable yoke, I feel myself required to express the warmest thankfulness, in the name of my sovereign, to the inhabitants of the capital of the Prussian monarchy for these sentiments. I shall not fail to state them to his majesty the emperor, and I doubt not that they will make the same impression upon him as they have made upon myself.

"Count WITTGENSTEIN, general of cavalry."

All the Hanse Towns, all Prussia, and indeed the whole of the north of Germany, were in a state of insurrection against the French. In Hamburg the French attempted to carry off the specie of the bank, but the populace rose and massacred most of the plunderers. The custom-houses were pulled down, the police-officers beaten, and their houses pillaged. French cockades and flags were torn down, and cries every where heard of "Down with Napoleon—Long life to the Emperor of Russia." The Austrians opposed no resistance to the Russians, but appeared, at this period, inclined to join them.

When the Russians entered Berlin a proclamation was issued by his majesty the Emperor of Russia, by which a full amnesty was assured to all the inhabitants of the late Polish, now Russian, provinces:—

"We, Alexander the First, by the Grace of God, Emperor and Autocrat of all Russia, &c. make known to every one,

"That whereas, in the course of the present war with the French, the main part of the inhabitants of the former Polish, but now Russian provinces and circles, have remained loyal to us; and for such cause have an equal claim on our favor and gratitude towards them, with all our other faithful subjects; but, there are others, who have by numerous ways drawn upon them our just anger. Some of these, on the enemy's entering the borders of our empire, either through dread of force and violence, or because they expected to save their property from destruction and rapine, accepted the offices and employments forced on them by the enemy; others, whose numbers are less, but whose crimes are much greater, as having taken the part of the foreign invader, even before his irruption into their country; and taken up arms with him, against us, and preferred being his shameless abettors rather than remaining our faithful subjects—these last should feel the sword of justice: but as we have already seen the wrath of God poured out on them, which has beaten them to the earth, as well as those who have implicitly surrendered; and as we are inclined to hear the voice of pity and compassion, which holds away in our breast, we make known our general and free pardon, consigning every thing past to eternal silence and oblivion, and likewise forbid in future all and every denunciation; in the perfect confidence, that those who have been unfaithful to us will feel the clemency of such procedure, and return back to their habitations within the space of two months from this day. But if any of them should remain in the service of our enemy after that period, without profiting by our clemency, and continue in the commission of the same crime after this pardon, Russia will consider them as confirmed rebels, and not receive them again into her bosom; but the whole of their estates shall be confiscated. And although the prisoners of war who were taken with arms in their hands shall not be excluded from this general pardon, yet we cannot, without infringement of justice, follow the impulse of our heart, until their captivity shall be ended by the conclusion of the present war; but even these shall likewise in due time arrive at the enjoyment of the advantages granted by this our pardon, which we extend to all and every one. Therefore may every individual partake in the general joy on the breaking of the power, and total destruction of the enemy of all nations; and, with open hearts express their gratitude to the Supreme Being! We likewise hope, that this our fatherly forgiveness, to which we have been impelled solely by sentiments of clemency, will bring the misguided to due repentance; and, in general, prove to all the inhabitants of those provinces, that they, as being of a nation which has for centuries past spoken the same language as the Russians, and are also descended from the same stock, can never, or in any place, be so safe and happy as in being perfectly united and incorporated with the powerful and generous Russian empire.

"ALEXANDER."

After the grand French army, (including the division of Grenier, amounting to 20,000 men, which, in the beginning of January, had hastened from Italy to its support,) had been reduced, by several severe engagements with the Cossacks, to about 18,000 men, and quitted Berlin, to lay the basis of future operations, in a more solid manner, somewhere or other behind the Elbe, but where they themselves did not well know, General Morand, who kept possession of Swedish Pomerania with about 2,500 men, and who, according to his first instructions, was to have maintained himself there, at all events, put himself in march to follow the grand army, whose left wing he formed, under the name of the army of Pomerania. On his march he was joined by the custom-house officers established there, and who wished to avoid any unpleasant collision with the inhabitants, who had shown them proofs, on many occasions, that they did not consider it as very high crime to maltreat, or even kill, custom-house officers: the mounted custom-house officers formed the cavalry of Morand's corps; this cavalry was about fifty men strong. The artillery consisted of eighteen pieces.

The Russian colonel, Baron Von Tettenborn, marched with his corps in the direction of Hamburg; his van-guard was at Lunenburg, when Morand, on the 15th of March, entered into Molln. Some parties of Cossacks that had been detached in front, and who appeared opposite Molln, caused the army of Pomerania to halt, and induced General Morand to remain there for the day, and in the night to march to Bergedorf, where he was met by the eleventh military division, and the custom-house officers stationed in Hamburg. General Morand made a feint of marching from Bergedorf to Hamburg, but was prevented by the Danish troops; 3,000 men of whom, with a numerous artillery, were stationed on the borders to maintain their neutrality.

BOOK X.

CHAP. VII.

1813.

It now appeared to be General Morand's intention to take a position in Bergedorf and the Vierlanden, and for this purpose garrisoned Eschenburg, a place situated a German mile towards Lauenburg, with 500 men and eight pieces of artillery. From Eschenburg to Bergedorf it is one continued defile, where cavalry was totally useless, and from this defile to the Elbe is a morassy country, cut through with innumerable canals; and possibly General Morand had calculated on being able to keep this post; but the regiments of Cossacks, pushed forward by Lieutenant-colonel Beckendorff, commander of the van-guard, fell in with the enemy, when some volunteers immediately dismounted, and continuing skirmishing, kept the enemy employed till late in the night. The enemy was not sparing of his cannon-shot, and answered every hurrah of the Cossacks with a fire of grape-shot. Meanwhile a detachment of Cossacks were sent by a bye-road to Bergedorf, who had driven the enemy's picquets into the town, and put every thing in alarm. After three such attacks, General Morand deemed the whole position untenable, and at break of day he marched to the custom-house store, from whence all the baggage had, in the course of the night, been sent across the Elbe. Colonel Von Tettenborn immediately caused the enemy to be pursued from Bergedorf as far as Eschenburg; at a mile's distance from the custom-house store, the enemy made a stand on a cross-dam, and placed a battery of six guns against the only dam by which he could be approached. The brave Cossacks kept up a fire of musketry, but could make no impression on the enemy, by reason of his advantageous situation. Colonel Von Tettenborn, notwithstanding the apparent disadvantage of the position, then caused a piece of artillery to be brought up. This gun, notwithstanding the very brisk fire kept up by the enemy with such a superior force of artillery, produced indeed a decisive effect on the enemy, who retreated with the utmost expedition. The Cossacks pursued him with rapidity, and did not allow him time to carry off the artillery, which was already put on board some craft. The enemy's convoy escaped in small boats, leaving six pieces of cannon behind them, which the Cossacks immediately made themselves masters of.

The day after this fortunate expedition, March 18, Colonel Von Tettenborn entered Hamburg—the fifth good city of the great French empire; but which had ceased to be a good city, even before the entrance of the Russian troops, and was merely denominated a city, without any additional title.

Before the Russians entered Hamburg, Count Von Wittgenstein sent the following addresses.

“To the inhabitants of the electorate of Hanover, the principality of Lauenburg, the freeimperial cities of Hamburg, Lubeck, and Bremen, and the territory of Munster.—To the inhabitants of the duchies of Westphalia and Berg, the principality of East Friesland, the Mork, and the lordships of Lingen and Tecklenburg, &c.

“German friends! Ye know not what you were, and what you are become. Ye were Germans, but ye have been forced to become Frenchmen; or, ye were free and happy citizens, and ye now bear those chains to which the compassion of the whole world sees one of the most civilized people of Europe debased. But take courage! Strongly has the justice of God shewn itself on the banks of the Dnieper, the Dwina, and the Berezina; and heavy has the sword of his vengeance fallen on the head of your enemies, of the general enemies of liberty, of the laws of nations, and of the independence of your princes—the enemies of all social virtue.

“Heavily injured German friends! The hour of your redemption draws nigh; already does the van-guard of my corps, now entering your territory, bring you my salute from Berlin. Bound in the closest alliance with Prussia, England, and his other powerful allies, Alexander, the liberator, my victorious lord and emperor, sends me to you, to break your chains, to restore you to your languages, your ancient forms of government, so dear to you, and to restore you to yourselves.

Irritated and revengeful, that good fortune, which has been so much misused by your oppressor, has suddenly turned her back upon him. He has lost an army of half a million experienced warriors. He may still drive together some heaps of unhappy sacrifices to his ambition, but he will never again be able to raise a formidable army. With a powerful hand has Russia torn away the bandage from the eyes of the nations;—the magic, which enchained their senses, is dissolved; they have again begun to value themselves and their own strength: and even that nation itself, equally unfortunate as sensible, begins, with blushes, to feel that she, as a blind instrument of the wild and insatiable ambition of a foreigner, is carrying her own chains into countries which formerly received the arts and sciences from her. Brave men of Germany! learn to comprehend, that it is by your own selves that ye are kept in chains—that to be free ye do not stand in need even of our assistance, but only of your own energetic will. Receive the valiant Russians as your friends—as your allies. Join yourselves to them and to the Prussians—your brethren—your relations—who come with them in the noblest and most sacred cause for which an alliance was ever formed. But ye, ye few unworthy Germans, the despicable instruments of expiring tyranny, tremble at the impending vengeance of God and man. Whilst I shall continue to treat every French warrior that falls into my hands, according to the most liberal laws of imprisonment in war; every German taken with arms in his hand against his native country shall, in the most distant provinces of Russia, bewail his ever having drawn his sword against the liberty of his fellow-citizens.

(Signed) "Count Von WITTGENSTEIN.
"Head-quarters at Berlin, March 16, 1813."

"To the inhabitants of the duchy of Brunswick Wolfenbittel; those parts of the Old Marche lying on the left bank of the Elbe and Magdeburg, the territories of Halle, Hildesheim, the city of Goslar, the lands of Halberstadt, Hokenstein, the territory of Quedlinburg, the counties of Mansfield, the Eichfeldes, of Treffurt, Muhlhausen, and Nordhausen.—To the inhabitants of the county of Stollberg, Wernigerode, the states of Hesse Cassel, of Rinteln, and Schaumburg, the territory of Katzenellenbogen, of Corvey, Gottingen and Grubenhagen, of Hohenstein and Elbingerode, the bishoprics of Osnaburg and Paderborn, of Minden, Ravensberg, and the county of Rietberg Kaunitz.

"German friends! Already have you too long obeyed a foreigner, never called to any throne,—who has no share in your interests—who has torn from you your rightful princes, that he might purchase a brainless vision for his horrid ambition, with the strength of your country, and the blood of your children. This insatiable ambition he fastened to the dreadful chain which he calls conscription, to draw away your sons and brothers, the hopeless flower of your country, to distant lands, where they dreadfully ended their lives in battles, in prisons, and in hospitals, venting imprecations on their cold-blooded tyrants and your weakness—lives which belonged to their native country, to their families—and which would have gladdened your days.

"Much-injured German friends! Your despair, the bitter tears of your mothers, wives, and brides, have become heavy in the scales of heaven. The victims of the most cruel tyranny, which have passed your impoverished habitations (now filled with misery,) and which could only raise horror and pity, have informed you of the severe vengeance which heavenly justice, whose patience was at length wearied out, has taken on the banks of the Dnieper. Receive by my advanced guards, now entering your countries, my salute, from Berlin—The hour of your deliverance has struck!

57.

"It is not the intent of the victorious emperor, my gracious lord, to conquer your country, but to gain your hearts, your thanks, and the gratitude of your succeeding generations. Bound in the closest alliance with Prussia, and his other powerful allies, Alexander, the liberator, sends me to you, to break your disgraceful fetters—to restore you your lawful princes, your native country, your language, laws, and customs—to free you from a foreign superior, who—history has yet no example of such an unnatural contempt of men—publicly and solemnly declares, 'that the first duty which he exacts from the regents he has given to the nations conquered by him, belongs to him; the second, to France; and only the third, to the people governed by them.'

"Brave and generous Germans! Will you suffer me alone to fulfil the honorable commission entrusted to me by my mighty emperor? Or has your slavery not yet so far debased you, but that you are still capable of feeling the emotions of revenge against your shameless oppressors, and will, in junction with me, reach the beautiful and appointed end in view?

"The magic deception is destroyed: the want of plan—of resolution—and incertitude in all their military movements—plainly shows you, that even the spirited French nation itself is gradually beginning to feel the dishonorable part to which the most cruel despotism has, hitherto unpunished, debased her. It must clearly appear to you, that you are kept in chains by means of yourselves, and that it merely depends on the return of the feeling your own value—that it requires only your own strong will, even without our assistance, to cease being the vassals of a foreign despot.

"You, prefects, and other public officers of the state! will ye assist the virtuous efforts of your fellow-citizens in reclaiming their most sacred rights, or will ye sink yourselves to be the assistants of a now expiring tyranny? In the latter case, do not reckon on my protection against the just vengeance of the people. I, myself, will some time place you and your assistants before the tribunal of the nation you have so greatly injured.

"Given at the head-quarters at Berlin, the 16th March, 1813.

(Signed) "The Count Von WITTGENSTEIN."

The following were Baron Von Tettenborn's proclamations to the inhabitants of Hamburg.

"Hamburgers! You dissolved the authorities established under the French government, even before the Russian troops had entered your territory, and restored the old magistracy.—This manly and respectable deed, with which you commenced the work of your liberation, and which has set you as an example for all Germany,

9 Z

BOOK X.

CHAP. VII.

1813.

tenders you worthy of the countenance of my monarch and the esteem of the Russian nation. You did not lead us into a new French, but into an old German city, and it was only by such a way that we could salute you as brethren.—Your joy on our entering your city has deeply affected every one among us; but still, ye German men and brethren! your joy will not be complete until you join your hands with ours in the great work of releasing Germany. Therefore, to arms! Whoever felt the ignominy of suffering oppression—to arms, for your country and justice! The great work of liberation is not yet completed, and until then no one should think of enjoying rest or pleasure.

"The most honorable employment now is to draw the sword, and drive, far away from the German territory, those foreigners who have already been pursued above 1,200 miles by the victorious Russian armies. Shame and disgrace fall on every one, who, in these eventful times, when the struggle is for the greatest blessings of the human race, can sit with his arms folded. Therefore, again, to arms! to arms! Under the protection of our august monarch, you will assemble under our own colours; and I am happy that it has fallen to my lot, to be the first to lead you against your enemies, and be a witness of your valour.

(Signed) "The imperial Russian colonel and commandant of a corps of Count Von Wittgenstein,

"Baron Von TETTENBORN,
"Hamburgh, the 7th (19th) March, 1813."

Proclamation.

"Having been informed, that much French property, (i. e. property of the French state or government,) still remains in this city, and is secreted for the benefit of the enemies of the country; and having also already received the intelligence of several places where such is kept or secreted; I hereby require all inhabitants of the city of Hamburgh, or its territory, to give me immediate information of all such French property, whether consisting in goods or money, concealed under whatsoever form it may be. Whosoever shall omit giving such intelligence, within the space of twenty-four hours from this day, shall, even though not the possessor, but merely having a knowledge of such transactions, be punished as a traitor to his country.

"Given at Hamburgh, the 7th (19th) of March, 1813.

(Signed) "The imperial Russian colonel and commandant of a corps d'armée under the Count of Wittgenstein,
"Baron Von TETTENBORN."

The Russians entered Hamburgh amidst the joyful acclamations of the citizens, and in consequence of this happy event, the ancient government was restored.—Satisfaction smiled on every countenance. The Cossacks could not move from their posts, but every hand was ready to help them to alight, every arm to embrace them, and when their bodies could not be reached, their clothes were eagerly grasped. Mothers lifted up their children to take them by the hand, and on all sides loud vivas resounded to welcome them.

The King of Prussia, who was immediately visited by the Emperor Alexander, concluded an offensive and defensive treaty with his imperial majesty. In consequence of this treaty, Count Von Wittgenstein issued the following order.

"It has pleased his royal majesty the King of Prussia to join all his troops under the command of Lieutenant-general Von York to my corps.

"The command of so greatly distinguished warriors is in every respect flattering and honorable to me, and a security for the success of the good cause in which I bear my sword.

"Our nations have been friends for more than fifty years; a dark interval of a few months, brought about by imperious circumstances, has only more animated the friendly sentiments of both our great sovereigns towards each other, and drawn still closer the ties existing between their people. There is but one, one only, great interest which connects us. It is the strife of liberty, of virtue, against the enemy of the independence of all nations. What you, valiant Prussians, have done against us, through the real feeling of duty, though contrary to your better knowledge, is proved by the history of the last campaign, by our own testimony. You will be unconquerable, now that you can join this sense of duty to the high conviction that you fight for the independence of your native country, and your king, and for your own honor.

"Noble Prussian Warriors, let us, in fraternal love and unity, proceed onward to the attainment of the greatest end for which armies were ever united. Ours is the very singular happiness of serving two princes, who have drawn the sword for the happiness and independence of their nations, and for the salvation of Europe;—two nations but by name, no trifling interests of common life will part us in our sacred combat: Without jealousy—without any personal concern intervening—we will jointly conquer the laurels with which, after our work is completed, the gratitude of liberated nations will form our wreaths.

(Signed) "Count Von WITTGENSTEIN.
"Head-quarters, at Berlin, March 18, 1813."

Baron Von Tettenborn gave notice, that all persons who should allow themselves to keep up a connection with the French, and also such Germans who should hereafter supply the French with any kind of articles in those states of Germany still occupied by the French, should be considered as traitors to their native country, and be brought before a court-martial.

The King of Prussia now declared General D'York free from all blame respecting the convention which he concluded with the Russian General Diebitsch, and addressed his subjects and army in the following manner:

"It is unnecessary to render an account to my good people of Germany of the motives for the war which is now commencing: they are evident to impartial Europe.

"We bent under the superior power of France. That peace which deprived me of half my subjects, procured us no blessings; it, on the contrary, hurt us more than war itself. The heart of our country was impoverished; the principal fortresses were occupied by the enemy; agriculture was neglected, as well as the industry of our cities, which had risen to a very high degree; liberty of trade being interrupted, naturally closed all the sources of ease and prosperity.

"By the most exact observance of the stipulated treaties, I hoped to obtain an alleviation for my people; and, at last, to convince the French emperor, that it was his own interest to leave Prussia independent: but my intentions—my exertions to obtain so desirable an object, proved fruitless. Nothing but haughtiness and treachery was the result!

"We discovered, though late, that the Emperor's conventions were more ruinous to us than his open wars. The moment is now arrived, in which no illusion respecting our condition can remain. Brandenburgians! Prussians! Silesians! Pomeranians! Lithuanians! you know what you have suffered during the last seven years; you know what a miserable fate awaits you if we do not honorably finish the contest which is now commencing. Remember former times! Remember the illustrious elector, the great Frederick! Remember the benefits for which our ancestors contended,—the liberty of conscience, honor, independence, trade, industry, and knowledge. Bear in mind the great example of our allies the Russians; think of the Spaniards and Portuguese. Small nations have even gone to battle for similar benefits against a more powerful enemy, and obtained victory. Remember the Swiss and the Netherlands.

"Great sacrifices are required from all ranks; because our plan is great, and the number and means of our enemy not less so. You will make them sooner for your country, your king, than for a foreign regent, who by so many examples has proved he would take your last sons and last strength for designs to which you are strangers. Confidence in God, constancy, courage, and the powerful assistance of our allies, will favour our just cause with glorious victory. But, however great the sacrifices that may be required from individuals, they will not outweigh the sacred interests for which they are given—for which we must combat and must conquer, or cease to be Prussians or Germans.

"We are now engaged in the last decisive contest for our existence, our independence, and our property. There is no medium between an honorable peace or glorious ruin. Even this you would sustain for your honor, because a Prussian and German cannot live without it. But we dare confidently trust, God and our firm purpose will give our just cause victory, and with this an uninterrupted peace, and the return of happier times!

(Signed) "FREDERICK WILLIAM."

"To my army!—Often have you expressed your wishes to fight for the liberty and independence of your country. The moment for doing so is now arrived. He is no member of the nation by whom this is not felt. Youth and men voluntarily fly to arms! What in them is free-will, is to you who belong to the standing army, a call. From you, ordained to defend the native country, she is entitled to demand what is offered by others.

"See! what numbers forsake every thing they hold most dear, to venture their lives with you in their country's cause. You will, therefore, doubly feel your sacred duty. May all of you, on the day of battle or in time of trouble, keep in mind moderation and due discipline. Let not individual ambition, either in the highest or lowest of the army be cherished. He that feels for his country does not think of self. May the envious meet contempt, when the general welfare only is concerned.

"Every thing else must now give way to this. Victory proceeds from God! Shew yourselves worthy of his high protection, by obedience and fulfilling your duties. Let courage, constancy, loyalty, and good discipline, be your renown. Follow the example of your forefathers, be worthy of them, and remember your posterity!

"A sure reward will fall on him who distinguishes himself;—deep disgrace and punishment on him that forgets his duty.

"Your king will always be with you, and with him the Crown-prince and the princes of his house. They will fight along with you—they and the whole nation will combat with you; and at our side a valiant people come to our assistance, and to the assistance of all Germany—a people that, by glorious deeds, has secured its independence.

"They relied on their sovereign—their leader—their cause—their own strength—and God was

BOOK X. with them: so will it be with you; for we also CHAP. VII. fight the great fight for the independence of our country!

1813.

"Confidence in God, courage, and perseverance, be our word.

(Signed) "FREDERICK WILLIAM."

CHAPTER VIII.

Decrees of the French Senate.—Seat of the Campaign in Germany.—German Declaration.—King of Prussia's Edict.—Addresses to the Inhabitants of Saxony by Blucher and Wittgenstein.—Meeting of the Emperor of Russia and King of Prussia.—Threatened Reprisals against the French.—Napoleon quits Paris to take the Command of the French Army.

THOUGH Bonaparte affected indifference to the coalition which was now forming against him, and amused the Parisians with the hope of soon overcoming his enemies, yet, as before-mentioned, he called a senatus consultum for the purpose of speedily augmenting the French army. The following was the report of Count Defermont to the senate, on the plan for calling out an additional force, in consequence of the war with Russia:

"My lord and senators.—You have just heard the communications which his majesty has ordered to be made to you: existing circumstances render an augmentation of our military force indispensable; it is the object of the senatus consultum which we are charged to present to you.

"If we must regret the defection of an ally, it is better to see him openly in the enemy's ranks than be exposed to his daily treacheries. The disposable force of Prussia is not such, but that the empire may make her repent having re-entered into a contest with her; but you know, gentlemen, that if we wish for peace, it must be obtained by successes that will guarantee its durability; and to obtain that object, it is much better immediately to employ great means than gradually exhaust ourselves in feeble efforts.

"The first title of the projet puts 180,000 men at the disposal of the minister at war, to be added to the active armies. Ninety thousand men taken of the conscription of 1814, whose levy has been authorised, will only find a change in their destination.

"Ninety thousand men are to be levied agreeably to the dispositions of titles two and three of the projet.

"The defections of Prussia may augment the forces of our enemies with about 80 or 100,000 men, and it is, therefore, both right and advisable to increase the army of the empire in the same proportion.

"Title three creates four regiments of horse-guards of honor, in the whole to complete 10,000 men.

"The departments have demanded the formation of companies of body-guards. This institution, necessary to the throne, can only be progressively realised.

"The officers can only be taken from the first ranks in the army, and their presence with the corps they command is now necessary. If they were taken from less elevated ranks, they would fail of the intended end, and be contrary to the nature of the institution, because there would not be placed at their head those who are to be especially responsible for the safety of the emperor and his family: men who are clothed with the first dignities in the army and in the state.

"The body-guard is otherwise not needful for the present moment; the gens d'armes, the troops of the garrisons, and 5 or 6,000 men of the imperial guard, both of horse and foot, which are now at Paris, and which are composed of old soldiers, not so able to go to war, and young people, commanded by officers d'elite, guarantee the maintenance of good order in the capital.

"It is nevertheless useful to proceed to the formation of these companies of body-guards, and to strengthen the army with men still in the flower of their age, whose profession is arms, and who are languishing out of employment.

"It is even necessary to open a career for young people, who are fitted for it by the education they have received, to become soldiers; but who, having attained their twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth year, consider themselves as being then too old to run the chance of a slow promotion in the military career.

"It is with this view that we have conceived the dispositions of title two. The men called to compose the four regiments shall clothe, equip, and mount themselves at their own expense; but they have the certainty of obtaining the brevet of officers, after a campaign of twelve months, and they shall be capable of admission into the formation of the four companies of body-guards, if they shall be promoted thereto when the campaign is finished; they may even be employed in detachments of 3 or 400 men, to assist in the service of the empress, or that of the King of Rome. These regiments shall receive the pay of horse chasseurs in the imperial guard. In fine, the members of the legion of honor, or their sons, if they have not a sufficient fortune to do it themselves, may be equipped and mounted at the charge of the legion.

"These united advantages will, no doubt, lead the children of the members of the electoral colleges, of the departments and circles, of the municipal councils, the sons of the most respectable people in the departments and communes, and, in short, of all those who are depositories of the public authority, to inscribe themselves in these regiments: and there will be no excuse left for those idle young people who complain of having no employment open for them, and who too often give cause for reprimanding their excesses.

"Title three makes a new call for 80,000 men of the first ban, as well for recruiting the army as for forming an army of reserve; but from which are excepted such men as were married before the publication of the senatus consultum.

"This call will give soldiers of the age of from twenty-one to twenty-six years, and consequently men in their full vigour, and capable of entering into the corps as soon as they shall have received the preliminary instructions.

"The cohorts formed by the first call on this ban, have already proved what expectations we may promise ourselves from the new call proposed.

"We do not dissemble how painful this appeal must be to the last classes; but what French citizen does not feel it preferable to make a present effort to avoid making greater ones in future; and from which the same results could not be expected?

"Exclusive of this, the calls, and their fixed times, should be determined by arrests of the council, and those executive measures shall be taken in the most proper manner, to prevent all injustice and difficulty.

"You well know, gentlemen, the spirit of foresight which always guides his majesty's designs: and thus, to prevent every kind of danger, and even of inquietude, he has deemed it necessary to organize an army of reserve, which, encamped on our frontiers, will at the same time watch for their defence, and maintain order among our allies.

"Title four renders disposable the 90,000 men of the conscription of 1814, who had been destined for the defence of our western and southern frontiers; they will form the army of reserve on the eastern frontiers, where they will fill this new destination.

"To the honor and courage of the national guard, the emperor confides the defence of the six great ports of the military marine: it is to the national guards that he confides the care of repulsing any attack of our enemies on the coasts of the empire.

"You have not forgotten, gentlemen, with what ardour the inhabitants of our coasts marched against the expedition directed to the ports of Antwerp.

"But it is necessary to direct this zeal; and what happened in 1809 has shewn how important it is to organize the service of the national guard in such parts of the empire where it may be deemed necessary.

"Those departments which are especially called upon to occur in the defence of the ports, are designated in title four.

"The national guard shall be organized in the departments, if it shall be found needful; and the companies of grenadiers and chasseurs be completed in such manner, as to present a force of from 15 to 30,000 men in every circle, effective, present, and always disposable.

"It is from the bosom of the senate, gentlemen, that his majesty will select the generals whom he will charge to preside over the organization of these companies, and to take the command of them.

"In giving the citizens such chiefs to guide them in these sentiments of honor as have so many claims on the general esteem, it was his majesty's wish to encourage the confidence of the national guards; to render their obedience more easy, and to secure to them such regard and esteem as may be consistent with the duties of the service.

"Not more than from 1,500 to 3,000 men from each circle will be put into activity; and these will be placed at those points where their services may be deemed necessary, and will be relieved every three months, in order that they may not be too long detained from their occupations and business.

"The contingent of every circle shall be in readiness to march to such points as may be attacked, but will not be parted from their families, excepting in such cases, and then only for the time that the danger may exist.

"This contingent, reduced to the lowest number of 15,000 men for each circle, will give 90,000 men; to which, when we join 20,000 gardes-côtes, 60,000 of the marine-troops, 20,000 workmen employed in the great ports, the local national guard, about 40,000 men in the dépôts of the land army, who are within reach of the coasts, and lastly, 60,000 men of the gens-d'armes, distributed in the same arrondissement, the defence of our coasts will be found to be secured by upwards of 250,000 men, independent of the reserve of grenadiers and chasseurs, who are not entered in the first contingent, and which will besides amount to upwards of 120,000 men more.

BOOK X.

CH. VIII.

1813.

BOOK X.

CH. VIII.

1813.

"It is, nevertheless, by means of this measure, which does not call out more than one thousandth part of the population of the six arrondissements, and merely for a temporary service, that the 90,000 men of the conscription of 1814 have been rendered disposable.

"The actual situation of Europe, the necessity our enemies are under of dividing their forces in Sicily, in Portugal, and in Canada, banishes every idea of our coasts being attacked; but, however improbable an attack may seem to be, it suffices that it is not impossible to induce his majesty, in his great wisdom, not to hesitate in adopting the measures which have been proposed to you.

"By giving your sanction, gentlemen, to them, you ensure the defence of our coasts and ports: and thus, the empire will have an army of 400,000 men on the Elbe, one of 200,000 in Spain, and 200,000 men, partly on the Rhine, partly in the 32d military division, and in Italy. And it is in the view of such forces, that our enemies conceive the ridiculous idea of dismembering the empire, and to allow our departments to be given as indemnities in their political calculations.

"This struggle is the last; Europe will make a definitive situation, and the events of the winter of 1813 will, at least, have been of advantage to France, by causing her to know her friends and her foes; the extent of her own means, the devotion of the people, and their attachment to the imperial dynasty."

This projet, after having been referred to a special commission, was adopted, and decreed by the senate, in the sittings of the 3d of April.

Count Boulay followed Count Defermont, and thus developed the motives of the second projet of the senatus consultum:—

"My lords and senators.—The ninety-second article of the constitution of the month of February, in the year eight, provides against the case of weighty circumstances compromising the safety of the state in any part of the empire, and authorises the suspension of the constitutional regulations in such part.

"It is for you, gentlemen, to whom the right has been confided by the senatus consultum of the month of Thermidor, in the year 10, to pronounce such a suspension, when the proposal for so doing is made to you by government.

"We come, according to its orders, to propose to you the momentary application of this measure, in the departments of the Upper Ems, the mouths of the Weser, and the mouths of the Elbe, composing the 32d military division. The circumstances in which those departments are at this day, will appear to you more than sufficient to determine you to the adoption of this measure.

"You will recollect, gentlemen, the motives of high policy which rendered necessary the union of those countries with the empire. The orders in council issued by the British council in 1806 and 1807, had annihilated the treaty of Utrecht, destroyed the liberty of maritime commerce, and placed all the continental powers in a state of dependance on England. To her orders in council, his majesty replied by the decrees of Berlin and Milan; the object of which was to subject England to a general and absolute blockade, and to keep all her merchandizes within his borders, under sequestration. By wishing to carry off all maritime commerce, and sporting with the laws of nations, England forced him to adopt a system necessary not only to the empire, and to its allies, but likewise to all the continental powers.

"Nevertheless, and previous to his taking this resolution, his majesty made proposals to the British cabinet to recal their orders in council, to consent to a peace, and to the liberty of commerce: this proposal having been rejected, the union of the Hanseatic Towns was decreed. If we consider the interest of these departments, independently of those of the empire, what is the political existence which those interests should cause them to desire?

"To belong to Prussia?—but these people rejected the leaden yoke of the Prussian government; and that government, which could not even defend the centre of its own states, would it have been able to protect a distant frontier?

"To belong to England?—but they would then have become the theatre of all the wars of England with the continent: and they would at once have devoted themselves to the misfortune of supporting the evils of war and the uncertainty of conquest.

"To remain Hanseatic towns?—but they could no longer be independent cities, since England no longer respects the neutrality of any flag. The government of these cities was enabled to subsist so long as they were surrounded by states interested in their preservation, and because England not having yet acquired that superiority by sea which she so greatly abuses, it might be for the convenience of the Belligerent powers that there should be a neutral flag. But this being once broken, the cities could not seek protection but in the strength of a great state, which would, sooner or later, procure them the enjoyment of those advantages which their situation offers them. The union of these departments with France, was accompanied by proper measures for joining the Baltic to the Seine, to establish an easy and safe communication between the old and new subjects, and to blend all their interests by combinations equally useful to both. Thus, gentlemen, were the advantages of this union felt by all the enlightened people of those countries; and we soon saw a numerous deputation from the Hanseatic cities lay at the feet of his majesty's throne the homage of their gratitude, their devotion, and their fidelity. All the benefits of our political system have been communicated to these new departments; our codes have been published there—our institutions have been there realised; equitable laws, by effacing whatever the feudal system there presented odious and contrary to the principles of civilization and of all good government, have there respected all the rights of property, and the advantages of this legislation have been generally acknowledged. Such, gentlemen, was the condition of these countries, when the misfortune which a rigorous and premature season occasioned to the grand army, reanimated among our enemies those hopes which our victories had disconcerted.

"All kinds of intrigues have been given ear to. A new coalition is formed in the north, and Prussia, believing that she may show her hatred with impunity, has set the world the example of an odious perfidy. The coalesced, in their transactions, have ceded Norway to Sweden, and promised our Hanseatic possessions to Denmark, as an indemnification. The Danish government has rejected an arrangement, which, by despoiling it of an important part of her states, offers her nothing in return but a chimerical hope, and the certainty of an eternal war with the empire. A wise and enlightened prince has not forgotten the outrages of England: he has felt the true interest, and remained faithful to us.

"Nevertheless, the enemy has approached our Hanseatic departments, and has there sown the seeds of trouble and revolt. Could he have blinded them to such a point as to persuade them that he could withdraw them from the obedience they owe to his majesty?

"How!—because a tempest, which prudence could not foresee, has dispersed a part of our victorious army, our enemies flatter themselves that they may, at their pleasure, dispose of our territories according to their ambition!—they believe that they can dictate the law to us, and draw us into a disgraceful peace. Without doubt, it would soon become necessary to burn our fleets, destroy our docks, and reduce our navy to thirty vessels, as they have dared to propose to us. Deprived of our colonies, and the advantages of a maritime commerce, we should furthermore renounce our continental power, and suffer our manufactures and our national industry to perish, and become, in every respect, the servile tributaries of England!—No, no; the nation is of the same sentiments with her sovereign: full of confidence in the firmness of his character, and the resources of his genius, she will never suffer the least attempt to be made against the dignity of his crown; she will deplore that it may require all his energy to repulse such vain pretensions: she has already made known her noble sentiments, and we shall see her persevere in them with unshaken constancy.

"You, gentlemen, who are the principal organs of this generous people, you will shew yourselves its worthy interpreters, by sanctioning the measures proposed to you. What we are especially charged to present to you is, as we said at the commencement, in the cases provided for by our constitution. Since the enemy has defiled the territory of the Hanseatic departments, since he has excited there disorders and seditions, and that he has there raised culpable hopes, it is evident, that the empire of the constitutional and common law, the exercise of which pre-supposes a regular and peaceable state of affairs, should be there suspended, and make way for whatever extraordinary measures may be commanded by circumstances. This suspension is, however, only for three months: every thing leads us to believe that it will not require more than that time to bring those departments again under perfect submission; and we have no doubt that we shall see all the good citizens, all the enlightened people of those countries, concur of themselves to the success of the measures which his majesty will take to restore there the government of order and law."

This projet, after having been referred to a special commission, was also adopted and decreed by the senate.

At Magdeburgh the French pretended they would stop the progress of the Russians; and, in the vicinity of that fortress, Bonaparte meant again to try the fortune of war in a general battle. Magdeburgh is considered a sort of internal Gibraltar, requiring a vast army to form the siege, and a great length of time to reduce it. The Prussian governor surrendered it without making any defence, after the battle of Jena, being bribed, it was said, by Bonaparte; and he was convicted and disgraced for his crime, after the termination of the war. The French had ever since made it their grand dépôt, their place of arms and stores, and of assemblage for their forces, with a view to maintain their acquisitions, and to carry on their ulterior designs for the conquest of Russia and the entire subjugation of the North.

The Koningsberg paper, of the 15th of March, contained the following spirited declaration.

"We, the undersigned officers from the royal Bavarian, Saxon, Westphalian, and grand Ducal Frankfort services, who have joined the German legion, hold ourselves obliged, as men of honor, and with due respect, love, and confidence, publicly to lay before our princes and native country the motives which have induced us to take this step.

"We are Germans. This single word includes every thing. For a series of years past, we could only sigh for our country, without being able to save her. At length the moment is arrived, when Germany can raise her depressed neck, when our hopes are more raised than ever of throwing off the slavish yoke of France. Victorious Russian armies pursue the enemy from river to river; the Prussian eagle strikes her mighty wings; numberless volunteers hasten to the Prussian standard; every where, even in those parts where the enemy still keeps his footing, a general spirit is rising, which promises to reconquer Germany's lost honor and liberty. Fathers, themselves, bring their sons, women their jewels, and even the poorest contribute the mite; and we, men of Germany, shall we remain unconcerned spectators, or even, perhaps, in a foreign service, assist in laying our native country again in chains? Never, never! Whosoever shall now fight against his brethren is, in our eyes, a traitor to his native country! Whosoever will not fight for her, neglects his most sacred duty! for we were German citizens before we were soldiers; we never could enter into a compact for shedding the blood of our brethren on our maternal soil, to quench the thirst of strangers with it; neither, truly, have our noble princes intended it; they have been obliged to submit to superior power; they have been forced to tear their own entrails! We are, therefore, convinced that our revered princes will, themselves, approve the step we have taken, although their tongues may yet be chained; we are assured, that we are acting beforehand with their secret wishes, as we arm ourselves for their independence; and should there be one amongst them who thinks otherwise, will posterity denominate him a German prince?

"We do not live in times that can be measured by a common scale; we live in times of bitter, general distress, which knows no other law than that of firmly joining for speedy assistance. That, and that only, is now the law. Let every true German search his bosom, and ask himself if it is otherwise?

"No personal necessity has brought us under the standards of the German legion; we are led to it only by the sense of honor, and the love of our native country. We will not fight with Frenchmen against Germans; but with Germans for Germans. Should there be German princes, soldiers, or citizens, capable of denying such motives, we would still calmly fulfil our most sacred duty, appeal to posterity, and from her expect the crown of renown due to the faithful sons of their country. Posterity will not ask in what service we were engaged, but for what cause we fought; whether for Germany and humanity, or for France and tyranny?

(Signed) "V. OELHAFEN, WALTSTAB, V. BOXBERG HILLENBRAND, V. GLAUHOFEN, V. BERCE, LEHMANN, V. THOMAS, V. HANN, V. HOHEN-EICHEN, B. V. WALDMANNSDORFE, NEIDHARD, SCHLEITER, TROTT, V. BEYER, SCHNEIDERS.
"Koningsberg, the 12th of March, 1813."

On the 27th of March, the following edict was issued by the King of Prussia:

"Having found cause to withdraw ourselves from the alliance with France, we likewise deem it necessary herewith to declare, that all restraints under which commerce, even in our states, has hitherto suffered in consequence of the so denominated continental system; and the ships and goods of all friendly and neutral nations shall be freely permitted to enter our harbours and territories without any exception or difference. All French goods, either produce or manufactures, are on the contrary herewith totally prohibited, not only for use, but likewise to pass through our territories, or those occupied by our armies.

"The so denominated continental impost is taken off, and exclusive of the consumption excise to be especially paid on foreign goods entered inward by sea, for home consumption, there shall be levied the heretofore established moderate impost and transit duty, as it was previous to the establishment of the continental impost in the year 1810, which duty shall be collected on the gross weight, but only continue so long as the increased expences arising from the war carrying on for the liberation of Germany shall render it necessary.

"We give to our privy-counsellor of state and chief of the inward customs department, M. Von Heydebreck, full and uncontroled power to make what further alterations he may see fit, in the whole of the forementioned impost, and to put them in a proper proportion; as likewise to reduce, or entirely take off, at his own judgment, the consumption excise on such articles where the collecting the full consumption excise, together with the impost duty, would fall too heavy on the home consumption.

"All our public officers, whom this matter concerns, have to pay due attention hereto.

"Given at Breslaw, the 20th of March, 1813.

(Signed) "FREDERIC WILLIAM,
"HARDENBERG."

The following were Marshal Blucher and Count Wittgenstein's addresses to the inhabitants of Saxony.

"Buntzlau, March 13, (23.)

"Saxons!—We Prussians enter your territory to offer you our fraternal hand. In the north of Europe the Lord of Hosts has held a dreadful court of justice, and the angel of death has cut off 300,000 of those strangers by the sword, famine, and cold, from that earth which they, in the insolence of their prosperity, would have brought under the yoke. We march wherever the finger of the Lord directs us, to fight for the security of the ancient thrones and our national independence. With us comes a valiant people, who have boldly driven back foreign oppression, and, in the high feeling of its victories, have promised liberty to the subjugated nations. We bring to you the morning purple of a new day. The time for shaking off a detestable yoke which, during the last six years, dreadfully crushed us down, has at length arrived. A new war unluckily commenced, and still more unhappily concluded, forced upon us the peace of Tilsit; but even of the severest titles of that treaty, not one was kept with us. Every following treaty increased the hard condition of the preceding one. For this reason we have thrown off the shameful yoke, and advance to the heart-cheering combat for our liberty.

"Saxons! Ye are a noble enlightened people! You know, that without independence, all the good things of this life are, to noble minds, of little value—that subjection is the greatest disgrace. You neither can nor will bear slavery any longer—you will no longer permit a cunning and deceitful system of policy to carry its ambitious and depraved views into effect, to demand the blood of your sons, dry up the spring of your commerce, depress your industry, destroy the liberty of your press, and turn your once happy country into the theatre of war. Already has the Vandalism of your oppressive foreigners wantonly and unmercifully destroyed your most beautiful monument of architecture, the bridge of Dresden. Rise—join us—raise the standard of insurrection against foreign oppressors; and be free!

"Your sovereign is in the power of foreigners, deprived of the freedom of determination, exploring the steps a treacherous policy forced him to take; we will no more attribute them to him, than cause you to suffer for them. We only take the provinces of your country under our care for your lord, which fortune, the superiority of our arms, and the valour of our troops, may place in our power. Supply the reasonable wants of our warriors, and, in return, expect from us the strictest discipline. Every application to me, the Prussian general, shall be opened to all oppressed persons. I will hear every complaint, examine every charge, and severely punish every violation of discipline. Every one, even the very meanest, may with confidence approach me. I will receive him with kindness.

"The friend of German independence will, by us, be considered as our brother; the weak-minded wanderer we will lead with tenderness into the right road; but the dishonorable, despicable tool of foreign tyranny, I will pursue with the utmost rigour as an enemy to our common country.

(Signed) "BLUCHER."

"Berlin, March 25.

"Brave Saxons! In what manner am I to address you? As your enemy? I am not such.—You are worthy Germans, and I am come, in the name of my emperor, to release all Germans from their shameful yoke. I will, therefore, speak to you as your friends—hear me, for I mean well to you.

"It is probable that you are surprised at the sight of Russians and Prussians entering your country in arms; it is probable that you may be in dread, and uncertain what to do, your king having forsaken you and ordered you to remain quiet. But when a house is on fire, a neighbour must not stand to ask the owner's permission to quench it.

"Your king's house has long been on fire; he, himself, is in distress, and dare not speak so as his German heart would assuredly dictate to him. For do but consider; he a German king—he who so long has been forced to give your energies and blood to the French, could he order you to remain quiet at a moment when inactivity is a crime?

"The hour has struck that will never strike a second time; the hour of delivery from a foreign yoke!

"Up! up! and arm yourselves, were it even only with sickles, and scythes, and cudgels! Drive the strangers from your soil. You shall always find me and my Russians, with the valiant Prussians, wherever danger is most prominent.

(Signed) "Count VON WITTGENSTEIN."

When the Russian emperor and the King of Prussia first met, they embraced each other and wept, without being able to speak a word, and when the emperor joined the royal family, all shed tears of emotion. The monarch took the little princess, his god-daughter, in his arms, and said, "these shall be the last." In the city and suburbs of Breslau, Prussian troops were drawn up in ranks, and when the emperor expressed his surprise at it, the king told him, "These are the prisoners taken by my troops in this war; they have been well-treated the whole time." They were all equipped in the best manner.

On the 30th of March, the Russian general of cavalry, Count Wittgenstein, arrived at Beltzie, where he took up his head-quarters and issued the following proclamation:

"Saxons! I enter your country, either to make war upon, or to fight in conjunction with you, for your freedom and the restoration of your degraded honor. Choose! Your choice may place your crown in danger, and cause your children to blush for the conduct of their fathers!

"Look and see what passes around you!—See the noble Prussians, your neighbours. The whole nation has risen in mass; in their ranks the son of the ploughman is found by the side of the prince; all difference of rank is mingled together, and disappears at the great ideas of liberty, honor, king, and country. There is no other difference of talents and of zeal in the great and sacred cause. Liberty or death! is the word which Frederick William has given, and solemnly has his whole magnanimous people sworn to conquer or fall, worthy of such a prince.

BOOK X.

CH. VIII.

1813.

"Saxons! Germans! Our pedigrees, our family registers, close with the year 1812. The deeds of our ancestors are cancelled by the humiliation of their descendants. The restoration of Germany can alone renovate the nobility of the race, and restore it to its original splendor.

"COUNT WITTOGENSTEIN.

"Head-quarters, March 31."

In consequence of the menaces held out by the French generals to awe the Hanoverians, the following address to them, dated April 5, threatening reprisals, was published at Boitzenburgh on the 6th.

"By the correspondence of Generals Morand and St. Cyr, I perceived that the most severe measures are intended to be used against the inhabitants of the Hanoverian dominions, who, having been liberated by the victorious arms of his majesty the Emperor of Russia, received in his name orders to consider themselves as the subjects of their lawful sovereign, and who, by the express order of the commander of the Russian troops, were obliged to take up arms to defend themselves and their dwelling-places.

"It was not in their power to refuse compliance with these orders. A punishment equally just as severe, would have been the unavoidable consequence of their base desertion of their duty towards their sovereign; and it would undoubtedly be contrary to the laws of nations, adopted by all civilised people, should a single Hanoverian subject be considered a rebel and treated as such.—I will not allow myself to suppose, that you, gentlemen, will permit such an atrocious measure to take place; but I declare to you, that in all cases I am determined to use reprisals; and that all prisoners, without exception, which are now, or hereafter may be, in my power, shall be treated with the same severity as you may show towards the inhabitants of Hanover, and that they shall be answerable with their lives for the lives of the latter, who in taking up arms at the express command of the general of the Russians troops, only fulfilled their duty to their king and country.

(Signed) "BARON VON DORNBERG,
"Major-general in the service of Great "Britain, and commander of a Rus"sian and Prussian corps."

On the 15th of April, the Emperor Napoleon quitted Paris to take the command of the French army. He put himself on his route with his usual celerity, and travelled without repose or intermission, with the speed and with the absence of all ceremony belonging to an ordinary courier. Rapidity was the great characteristic of this man, and whatever precipitancy could effect, might indeed be expected from him; but he had not now that immense overwhelming force by which his former great achievements were executed.

CHAPTER IX.

Operations and Strength of the Allied Army for commencing the Campaign in Germany.—The Principles of the War against the French avowed.—Defeat of General Morand at Luneburg.—Defeat of Beauharnois by the Russians.—Surrender of Czenslokaw.—Engagement near Ottensberg.—Surrender of Spandau and Thorn to the Russians.—Battle at Gross Gorschen.—Battle at Lutzen.—Defeat of the French before Hamburg.—Battles of Bautzen, Weissig, and Wurstchen.—Blucher's brilliant Affair near Haynau.—The French enter Hamburg.—An Armistice.—Hostilities notwithstanding continued.—Affair near Halberstadt.—Rupture of the Armistice.—Victory by the Crown-prince.—The Emperor of Austria's Manifesto.—Death of General Moreau.—Emperor Alexander's Letter to Madam Moreau.—Victories at Leipsic, &c. &c.

THE Russian force was divided into three large armies—one under Wittgenstein, a second under Tchitchagoff, and a third under Winzingerode; Kutusoff commanding the whole.

Wittgenstein's main force prepared to cross the Elbe, in order to drive the French force towards the Maine. Part of Tchitchagoff's army was near Thorn, whilst another part was employed under Platow in the siege of Dantzic. Part of Winzingerode's army was near Custrin and Lansberg. Another part occupied the old town of Dresden, whilst another corps passed the Elbe at Schadau, to turn Davoust.

About 100,000 Russian reinforcements were on the Vistula.

The Prussian force was thus distributed:—General Blücher had moved from Silesia into Saxony.

General York was at Berlin with the main army. Detachments were sent to Hamburgh and Rostock, which were now occupied by Prussian corps. Another Prussian detachment invested Stettin.

A Swedish force was at Stralsund, and at the commencement of the campaign the Crown-prince of Sweden had the command of 50,000 men.

The Russian force with which the campaign opened, could not be less than 220,000 men. The Prussian 70,000. Swedish and Pomeranian 50,000. A grand total of 340,000 men.

To this must be added the force which Hanover, Hesse, Brunswick, and the Hanse Towns furnished.

The principles of the war against the French were avowed in the following address to the Germans, published in the Berlin papers.

"While the victorious warriors of Russia, accompanied by those of his majesty the King of Prussia, his ally, appear in Germany, his majesty the Emperor of Russia, and his majesty the King of Prussia, announce to the princes and nations of Germany, the return of liberty and independence. They only come with an intention of aiding them to re-conquer those inalienable benefits of nations, and of affording powerful protection and lasting security to the regeneration of a valuable empire.

"These two armies, trusting in God, and full of courage, advance, hoping that every German, without distinction, will join them.

"The confederation of the Rhine, that deceitful fetter with which the general disturber bound Germany, after dismembering her, and even obscuring her ancient name, can no longer be tolerated, as it is the effect of foreign constraint and of foreign influence. It must be dissolved.

"Their majesties will only give protection while the German princes and nations are engaged in completing the grand work.

"Let France, who is beautiful and strong through herself, occupy herself, in future, in promoting her internal welfare! No foreign power intends disturbing it—no hostile power shall be sent against her rightful frontiers. But be it known to France, that the other powers are solicitous of conquering lasting tranquillity for their subjects, and that they will not lay down their arms until the foundation of the independence of every European state has been established and secured.

"In the name of their majesties the Emperor of Russia and King of Prussia,

"Prince KUTUSOFF SMOLENSK,

"Field-marshal and commander-in-chief of the allied army.

"Head-quarters, Kalisch, 13, (25) March, 1813."

According to the dispositions made by his excellency Count Von Wittgenstein, the three flying corps, the first of which was under the command of General Von Dornberg, the second under General and Adjutant-general Von Tschernicheff, and the third under the command of General Von Tettenborn, were to precede the army, and to pass the Elbe between Hamburgh and Magdeburgh.

Whilst preparations were making for the passage, at Ferchland, Havelberg, Sandau, Werben, Lenzen, &c. the French army concentrated itself in the vicinity of Magdeburgh, and strengthened itself by a part of the troops which were in the vicinity of Dresden and Leipsic. Its left wing consisted of three considerable corps, which were encamped near Luberitz and Stendal, in the neighbourhood of Gardelegen, and the whole army was under the command of Marshals Davoust and Victor.

General Von Dornberg arrived first at Havelberg, and afterwards on the 26th of March crossed the Elbe at the village of Guitjebel, opposite to Werben, with his corps. On the 28th of March, the enemy, 4 or 5,000 strong, approached from Arneburg, and by their superiority of force, obliged that corps to quit the town of Werben, and recross the Elbe. The corps lost in this affair only one officer and eighteen dragoons, who by their own fault had remained too long at Werben. Meanwhile the corps of General Tschernicheff arrived at Havelberg from Genthin, and this general held a council of war with the other two generals, Von Dornberg and Von Benckendorff, concerning the future operations; in consequence of which General Von Tschernicheff first passed the Elbe with his corps at the Sandkrüge, and took possession of Seehausen and Lichterfeld, to secure the passage of the corps of Von Dornberg.

Scarcely were the needful dispositions made, when Major Count Von Puschkin, who was posted with a regiment of Cossacks at Lichterfeld, was attacked by three battalions of French infantry and 200 cavalry, with two pieces of artillery. This brave officer successfully kept the enemy employed, until a regiment of cavalry of the division of the Colonel Baron Von Pahlen came to his support. Both these regiments now, on their side, attacked the enemy, drove him back to Werben, and made two officers and sixty men prisoners. The vicinity of the enemy rendered it advisable that General Von Dornberg,

BOOK X.

CHAP. IX.

1813.

BOOK X.
 CHAP. IX.
 1813.

on crossing the river a second time, should not pass at Saudkrug, but somewhat lower down, near Lentzen, which he accordingly did on the 31st of March. Upon this the following disposition was made: General Dornberg's infantry marched to Dannenberg, the cavalry, under General Von Benkendorff, to Luckow, and the corps of General Von Tschernicheff towards Wustrow.

The last-mentioned general had, to secure this motion, detached two regiments of Cossacks, under the command of Colonel Von Wiassoff, to Seehausen, with orders to follow the other corps by the way of Arendsee and Salzwedel, to oppose the enemy posted between Stendal and Gardelegen. Scarcely was this position taken, when Generals Von Dornberg and Tschernicheff were informed, that General Morand, with a corps of upwards of 3,000 infantry, 11 cannon, and 300 cavalry, was pressing forward by the way of Tottstadt to Luneburg, to punish the inhabitants of that town for having dared to take up arms, and with the assistance of fifty Cossacks, of the corps of General Von Tettenborn, drove away a squadron of French cavalry, which wished to take possession of the town. The commanding generals then resolved on hastening to Luneburg, to protect the brave inhabitants from the fate which threatened them.

In consequence of the troops having made a forced march of ten German (forty English) miles in twenty-four hours, the corps of Dornberg and Tschernicheff could not arrive at Breitenstein and Bienenbittel until the 2d of April, in the morning, twelve hours after the entry of the French into Luneburg. Here they were informed, that on this very forenoon several executions were to take place in Luneburg, and that a number of victims were again to attest the tyranny of the oppressors of Germany. They, therefore, determined to attack the city on the moment, and for which they made the following dispositions. The Colonel Baron Von Pahlen was ordered by General Von Tschernicheff to surround the town on the left bank of the Elmenau with two regiments of Cossacks, and commence the attack there, and draw the attention of the enemy from the point of the main attack, intended to be made on the right bank of the Elmenau. At the same time, General Tschernicheff caused the position of Bienenbittel to be strongly garrisoned, it being of the greatest importance to the enemy for surrounding the Russian corps. General Dornberg had likewise the foresight to detach a regiment of Cossacks to Dallenburg, to cover the roads to Dannenberg, Gartono, and Lukow, and guard the passage over the Notze with one company of infantry and a cannon. Scarcely had these two corps approached the town, on the right bank of the El-menau, within the distance of two cannon-shot, and drawn themselves up in order, under cover of bushes and hedges; than Colonel Baron Von Pahlen, with great skill, commenced the attack on the other side with the expected success. The enemy went against him with two battalions of infantry and three pieces of artillery, with intent to cut him off from the road to Bienenbittel. Both parties encountered at this place, and charged each other briskly.

Generals Von Dornberg, Von Benkendorff, and Von Tschernicheff now caused on their side the cavalry to advance in such a manner, that Von Benkendorff led the right, and Tschernicheff the left wing. The enemy, who was in total ignorance of the strength of the Russian and Prussian corps, and imagined that he had only to deal with a few Cossacks, was hereby surprised: he, however, detached about a battalion of infantry, with two cannon, and 150 cavalry on this side. This cavalry was immediately attacked, and defeated by Colonel Von Bedraga, and the two cannon were likewise cut off from the town and taken. At the same time General Von Dornberg, at the head of the Prussian battalion of infantry, commanded by Major Von Borke, and cavalry, commanded by General Von Benkendorff, rushed on the enemy's battalion, drove it over the bridge, close under the town, on the right bank of the Elmenau. The Russian battalion of infantry, under the command of Major Von Essen, at the same time attacked them on the left bank of the Elmenau, and General Von Tschernicheff supported these movements with two pieces of artillery, and made an attack at the head of his cavalry. The Russian and Prussian infantry found the gates, the walls, and even the houses in the town, defended by the enemy's infantry. The situation of the place was favorable for making a vigorous resistance, and at this place one of the most obstinate and bloody engagements took place. Russians and Prussians emulating each other, covered themselves with glory; and our artillery, which was not more than 100 paces distant from that of the enemy, caused great devastation in the streets of the town.

The dispositions made by General Dornberg, during the engagement, did him much honor. General Tschernicheff, at the head of his hussars, broke into the town almost at the same time with the enemy's tirailleurs, and on this occasion the brave Major Count Von Puschkin was killed by a cartridge-ball.

At length the Prussians first succeeded, after the battle having continued with the greatest obstinacy at the entrance of the town for more than two hours, to possess themselves of another gate, and to make way for General Benkendorff's cavalry, and the rest of General Tschernicheff's cavalry. This forced the enemy to quit the town, which he did in such haste, that one of his battalions, being cut off, was obliged to remain there. The corps was so weak in infantry, that this battalion could not be immediately subdued, almost all the troops being employed in the pursuit of the enemy. Meanwhile, Colonel Baron Von Pahlen profited of this moment with the greatest ability, drawing the regiments of Cossacks sent him by General Tettenborn to his assistance, and manœuvred conjointly with Generals Dornberg and Tschernicheff's cavalry in such a manner, that the enemy was closed in on all sides. They now despaired of success, but nevertheless formed themselves into three squares, determined on defending themselves to the last. A brisk fire of musketry then commenced, as the battalion which was there cut off, being discovered by the Russian Yagers, made a desperate attack with the bayonet; but this was the enemy's last effort, who being mowed down by the Russian and Prussian fire of grape-shot, saw there was no possibility of escape, and laid down their arms at all points. The result of this warm day was nine pieces of artillery, (four of which were taken by the corps of General Dornberg; four by that of General Tschernicheff; and one by General Tettenborn's Cossacks); two of the foresaid guns, and two pair of colours, were presented to General Tschernicheff by Colonel Von Pahlen, and he received a third pair of colours by the Finland regiment of dragoons, under the command of Colonel Von Kruse. Among the prisoners was the commander of the corps, and general of division, Morand himself, who was severely wounded; and besides him were the chief of his general staff, de Lourde, the Saxon Colonel Von Eberstein, Colonel Poisy, and all the officers of the general staff. In the whole, there were upwards of 100 officers, and 2,200 privates, prisoners.

In general the zeal and assiduity, combined with judgment, evinced by the generals in this first battle of the combined Russian and Prussian troops on the left bank of the Elbe, reflected the greatest honor on them. The valour of the superior officers, and the courage of the soldiers, was above all praise. Every individual proved, on this glorious day, what might be effected by patriotism and zeal for the good cause.

The first considerable battle on the German ground, where two weak battalions of infantry, and by reason of the many detachments made, only about 2,000 cavalry, have taken a town encompassed with walls and ditches, and which was defended with the greatest obstinacy, was certainly an auspicious commencement.

General Von Borstell, with his detached corps, had already advanced as far as Wabnitz, for the purpose of surrounding Magdeburg on the right bank of the Elbe; but on the 2d of April, being attacked by a superior force, he, according to his previous instructions, retreated back to Nedlitz, but covered the roads to Burg and Gommern by Cossacks.

On the 5th of April the enemy obliged General Von Borstell to fall back to Gloina (on the road to Gortzke) and forced the Cossacks back past Leitskau, and towards Burg.

As General F. D'Auvray had received certain information that the Viceroy of Italy (Beauharnois), who commanded this expedition in person, and with a corps d'armée of four divisions, about 22 or 24,000 men strong, among which were 3,000 cavalry, and forty pieces of artillery, not only caused the country round Magdeburg, on the right bank of the Elbe, to be plundered, but likewise intended making an attempt on Berlin, he determined on attacking him with his whole strength, and driving him back. For this purpose, on the 4th of April, he concentrated the corps of Lieutenant-general d'York near Zerbst; that of Lieutenant-general Von Berg, at three German miles from thence, in the village of Leitskau, and fixed his head-quarters at Zerbst; he directed General Von Borstell, and likewise Lieutenant-general Von Bulow, who had so early as the 4th of April arrived at Ziezar, to push as far forward as the enemy would permit; but that they should on the 5th, when they would be informed by a cannonade of his having commenced an attack, fall on the enemy with the greatest impetuosity. On the 5th, in the morning, Lieutenant-general Von York's corps advanced to Leitskau, and that of Lieutenant-general Von Berg to Ladeburg. Lieutenant-general Von Borstell had advanced towards Mockern, and Lieutenant-general Von Bulow to Hohenzitz. At two o'clock in the afternoon, Lieutenant-general Von York was obliged to send a van-guard towards Gommern, and Lieutenant-general Von Berg to do the same to this place. The first van-guard came up with the enemy near Danigkow, and after a brisk cannonade forced him to quit that place with a considerable loss; whereupon F. d'Auvras caused the corps of Lieutenant-general Von York, and that of Lieutenant-general Von Berg to follow the van-guards, which were already engaged, and make a vigorous attack on the enemy. Generals Von Borstell and Von Bulow did the same on their side, the first advancing to Zehdenick, and the latter to Vehe-litz, which places were in the enemy's possession, but who was dislodged from thence by the valour of the Russian troops.

The resistance of the enemy, who had the advantage of the ground, was every where very obstinate; but he was nevertheless forced at all points to yield to the bravery of the Russians; and it was only by the darkness coming on that an end was put to the engagement, and they

BOOK X.

CHAP. IX.

1813.

BOOK X.

CHAP. IX.

1813.

were prevented from following up this glorious victory. The Lithuanian regiment of dragoons and two squadrons of the body regiment of hussars cut an enemy's regiment of cavalry totally to pieces, or made prisoners, or dispersed it. The same fate attended a second regiment of the enemy's cavalry, by the Grodnow hussars.

The tirailleurs of the brave Pomeranian battalion of grenadiers took a field-piece, with horses, from the enemy, and in the whole, six powder-waggons were taken, twenty-seven officers, and 900 privates made prisoners. The general of division, Grenier, and General Grundler were wounded. The enemy's loss amounted to about 2,000 men in killed and wounded. On the other side, one officer was killed, seven wounded, and about 560 privates killed or wounded. The enemy did not take a single man to keep with them; one Cossack was made prisoner, but he made his escape, and even brought his horse along with him. On the 6th, towards noon, General D'Auvray again sent a detachment of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, in search of the enemy, who had drawn off from all points in the course of the night; but this proved in vain, as on his retreat to Magdeburg he had quitted the defiles of Wahlitz and Alten Clus, and had cut off all the bridges.

Lieutenant-general Baron de Sacken having caused the fortress of Czenstokaw to be entirely surrounded, pointed out, immediately after his arrival before it, the places where batteries ought to be constructed. On the 21st of March, these batteries were finished, and provided with cannon. They opened their fire at the break of day, from eight pieces of the tenth battery. On the 22d, at midnight, three fresh batteries were erected, to play upon other points close to the fortress. These flying batteries played with such rapidity, that the enemy had scarcely time to level their guns against them upon one point before the fire was opened upon another. It was so well directed as to set on fire three magazines, viz. one of hay, another of straw, and a third of wood for fuel. Whilst the artillery was doing such execution, the 8th and 29th of chasseurs kept the garrison in so much awe, that not a man durst shew himself upon the walls of the town. The whole of this service was entrusted to Major-general Count de Lieven. Lieutenant-general de Sacken, on finding that the conflagration made such rapid strides in the fortress, ordered the batteries to cease firing, with an intent to preserve an image of the Holy Virgin, a monument of devotion which some centuries ago had been carried hither from the church of the east. On the 23d, the governor dispatched to Lieutenant-general de Sacken Meller, the commandant of the fortress, to request an armistice of twenty-four hours, to enable him to draw up the articles of capitulation. This was granted. However, the conditions proving inadmissible, the general ordered the cannonade to recommence. Two hours after, the commandant returned with a promise to surrender the fortress, and a capitulation was signed.

On the 22d of April, an engagement took place in the vicinity of Ottersberg and Rothenburg, between the van-guard, under command of Lieutenant-colonel Von Benkendorff, and the enemy, in which the latter was defeated and put to flight, with the loss of 100 prisoners, his baggage, and several hundreds killed and wounded.

By the attack of the Russian cavalry, the enemy, who was 3,000 strong, was forced to confide his movements to the high-road, and the well-directed fire of the Russian artillery soon compelled him to make a speedy retreat.

Though the French generals arrogantly declared they would be at Berlin in fourteen days, success still attended the Russian and Prussian arms. Spandau surrendered, on condition not to bear arms against Prussia or her allies for a certain time, and the garrison of Thorn also made a capitulation with the Russian troops.

On the 30th of April, information was received at General Count Von Wittgenstein's headquarters, of the greater part of the army and the French guards having crossed the Saale, in the vicinity of Naumburg. It was at the same time reported, that the Emperor Napoleon had arrived at the army. His majesty the Emperor Alexander, and his majesty the King of Prussia, therefore went to their armies, to animate the courage of the troops by their personal presence. But the better to be enabled to judge of the enemy's strength, a reconnoissance was undertaken with General Von Winzingerode's corps, from Leipsic, on the road to Weissenfels. This confirmed the intelligence received of the enemy being there in considerable force. Upon this, a very severe engagement took place on the 1st of May, with the said corps, by which the allies were convinced, that the main force of the enemy was in the vicinity of Weissenfels and Lutzen. It was believed, that the viceroy's position was between Leipsic and Halle, and consequently the enemy's plan for the battle was clearly apparent. General Count Von Wittgenstein resolved on being before hand with him, to obstruct him in his dispositions by a bold attack, and to restrain his offensive operations. It was necessary in this attempt to make it their main object immediately to fall on such part of his force as was, on his side, considered to be the best troops; in order, after such a stroke, to give larger space for the operations of their flying corps, over whom the enemy had latterly acquired a superiority. Therefore it was requisite, if possible, to direct the attack immediately against his rear-most troops. For this purpose, the main army broke up in the night between the 1st and 2d of May from Notha and Bornä, in two columns, and pushed forward as far as the defile of the Elster, in the vicinity of Pegau. General Von Winzingerode received orders to mask this operation, to leave his posts of cavalry standing, and to unite himself with the main army, by the way of Zwenkau.

At break of day all the troops passed the defile of the Elster, near Pegau, and drew up in order of battle on the left bank of the Elster, with their right wing to the village of Werben, and their left to that of Gruna. By reconnoitering, they discovered that the enemy's main body already extended beyond Weissenfels, to the villages of Gross-Gorschen, Klein Gorschen, Rahno, Starsiedel, and Lutzen. The enemy did not venture to attempt disturbing their march, nor to get before them into the plain, but took his position in the village between Gross-Gorschen and Starsiedel.

About 12 o'clock at noon, General Blücher received orders, as commanding the van-guard of the army, and supported by a part of the Russian artillery, to attack the enemy. The attack was made on the village of Gross-Gorschen, which was obstinately defended by the enemy. It was taken by storm. General York marched with his corps to the right of the village. The whole army wheeled to the right, and presently after the battle became general along the whole line of Blücher's corps. The enemy at the same time displayed a numerous artillery, chiefly of heavy calibre, and the fire of musketry in the villages was kept up with great vivacity for several hours. In this murderous battle the villages of Klein-Gorschen and Rahno, as likewise the villages of Gross-Gorschen, were early taken by storm, with unexampled bravery, and kept possession of for several hours. At length the enemy returned in considerable force, surrounded, and in part retook, these villages; but on the attack being renewed, was not able to retain possession of them. The Prussian guards moved forward, and after a most obstinate combat of an hour and an half, those villages were again retaken from the enemy, and retained. During this time, the corps of General Winzingerode, on the left wing, and the corps of General York, with a part of the Russian troops under General Berg, had taken a share in the battle. They stood opposed to the enemy, at the distance of 100 paces, and one of the most bloody battles became general.

Their reserves had drawn nearer to the field of battle, to be in readiness wherever needful, and thus was the battle continued till near seven o'clock in the evening. During its course the villages on the left wing were likewise several times taken and retaken by both parties. At seven o'clock the enemy appeared with a new corps on their right wing before Gross and Klein-Gorschen, (probably with the viceroy's army) made a brisk attack on them, and endeavoured to tear from them the advantages they had gained. The infantry of a part of the Russian reserve was now brought forward to the right wing, to the support of General York's corps, which was briskly attacked, and the most desperate engagement (in which the Russian artillery, during the whole remaining time, greatly distinguished itself, as did the corps of York, Blücher, and Winzingerode, the whole day) was continued until the night came on. The enemy had likewise again attacked their centre and the villages with great briskness, but they maintained their position. In this situation night put an end to the battle. The enemy was to have been again attacked on the following morning, the 3d of May. He had meanwhile taken Leipzig during the battle. This obliged them to manoeuvre with him. It was not till afterwards that they were informed, that in consequence of the battle he had again been forced to quit it, and had by the same means lost Halle, and 15,000 men of his best troops: many of his cannon were dismounted, and a number of his powder-waggons blown up. The light detachments were again at liberty to harass him, and to prosecute the advantage gained. The allies consequently kept the field of battle, and the intended purpose was accomplished. Near 50,000 of their best troops had not yet been engaged; they had not lost a single cannon.

Such was the battle of the 2d of May, fought near the plain of Lutzen, where the liberty of Germany was once before conquered. With the courage of lions did both Russians and Prussians fight for it. The loss they sustained was about 10,000 men, but the most of them only slightly wounded.

The enemy made attempts, on the night of the 8th, to re-establish the arches of the main bridge at Dresden, but the Russian artillery was so well directed, that they failed here, but succeeded in passing between Kadiz and Pilsnitz on the 9th. The ground being very commanding on the left bank, and favouring their establishing batteries of heavy guns, they passed in boats, and covered themselves advantageously; the passage was very bravely resisted by General Miloradowitch's rear-guard; and the Russian artillery, after displaying the greatest coolness and courage, was only withdrawn from the impossibility of contending against the superior position and fire of the enemy. Bonaparte had entered Dresden in person.

During the cannonade the fire of musketry was nearly uninterruptedly kept up, and frequently the valour of the allied troops proved itself in attack with the bayonet. Seldom or ever was there a battle fought with such animosity or so murderous. The French, commanded by Napoleon in person, derived great advantage from their position on the heights near Lutzen, where they had thrown up strong entrenchments, which they defended with a heavy fire of artillery. But the valour of the allied troops drove them back from one position to another, nor were they to be deterred even when the superior defence of the enemy, in his last positions, rendered frequent attacks necessary. The result of this warm day was, that the Russian and Prussian troops kept possession of the field-of-battle during the whole night, and caused the enemy double or treble greater loss than their own.

BOOK X.

CHAP. IX.

1813.

Marshal Davoust had, on the 9th, drawn a part of his troops, which had till then been stationed along the Elbe, from Lutzenberg to the mouth of that river, and concentrated about 5,500 men on a line from Hamburg to the customs store-house; with this force, at one o'clock in the night of the 9th, he made an attack on the island of Wilhelmsburg, and on Ochienwarder. He had left about 1,500 men at Hamburg; the allies had, on their side, 1,100 men, infantry, at Wilhelmsburg, and 600 at Ochienwarder. The enemy, who took advantage of the ebb-tide for landing, crossed the river in a mass at several points, under a smart fire from all his batteries; he pushed the advanced posts of the allied army, and caused them to fall back, and gradually gained some ground. But no sooner had the advanced posts and the smaller detachments joined the reserves in their rear, than the enemy was attacked, and a brisk fire commenced at all points. A battalion of Mecklenburghers were now sent to the support of Wilhelmsberg, and a regiment of Hanoverians, with a battalion of Lubeckers, advanced from Berge-dorf and the custom stores, against Ochienwarder and the enemy's right flank.

The enemy could not long withstand this new and impetuous attack; he gradually gave way at all points, covering his retreat by burning some houses and mills. The allied troops pursued him closely, and made many prisoners. The enemy then re-embarked under the protection of his numerous batteries on the other shore. His loss amounted to about 300 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners, and on the other side to about 150, among whom were thirteen officers.

On the 20th, at noon, the enemy attacked the combined army in its position at Bantzen; but his efforts, although they were directed against single points, with a great superiority of force, were of no effect; and the united army remained in their position during the night from the 20th to the 21st. On that day, at four, a. m. the battle commenced on their left wing with great spirit; but the attack made by the enemy on this side, as it afterwards appeared, was merely a feint. General Miloradovitch, under whom General

Emanuel commanded the light troops, had the command of the left wing, under the Duke of Wurtemberg. Some while afterwards the battle commenced with still greater impetuosity towards the centre, where the artillery, in particular, had great effect, and all the enemy's attacks were repulsed. General Lauriston's corps now appeared, and endeavoured to turn their right wing, but was detained by General Barclay de Tolly, who was posted at Gottamilde to observe the enemy, till General Kleist's corps, and Klux and Roeder's brigades fell on the rear of the enemy, and by a close cartridge fire, caused great destruction, and forced him to retreat. But by detaching these brigades, General Blucher's position, at the heights of Kreckwitz, was weakened, and the moment was seized by the enemy to attack this corps with a great superiority, before it could receive any support. General Blucher, therefore, found himself obliged to fall back upon a position a small distance in his rear, in order to join General York, who formed his reserve.

Meanwhile, to counteract this disadvantage, the left wing moved considerably forward, and took some cannon and prisoners from the enemy. The intended purpose was thereby attained, and the enemy was deterred from pressing any further on the right wing. Night put an end to this battle, which had lasted two days, and cost the enemy much blood. The allied army took up a position in the greatest order, and ready for battle, near Weissenberg, at a small distance from the field-of-battle. They had lost neither artillery nor prisoners, except a few who were severely wounded. On the other hand, they had taken both artillery and prisoners from the enemy, and many of his cannon were dismounted. A battalion of Wurtembergers, who were to have stormed a battery at Kreckwitz, came over to the allied army, as likewise did a part of the Saxon troops. The enemy's loss was in proportion of three to one more than the allied armies, as the ground, the superiority of their artillery, and the valour of the troops, gave them the advantage over him in all his attacks. The reserves of the centre and the left wing, among which were the flower of the Russian troops and their artillery, were not engaged.

On the 18th, General Howaisky again took prisoners another company of the Dutch lancers of the guards, ninety-four men strong; and in a reconnaissance with General Miloradovitch in the afternoon they took 132 prisoners, and caused the enemy a loss of 100 men in killed and wounded.

It being understood, that Lauriston's corps, about 12,000 strong, was in motion against their right flank, by making a large circle by the Luckau and Hoyerswerda-road, and that it was followed at the distance of a day's march by Marshal Ney, with a force of 18,000 men, it was accordingly resolved to march against General Lauriston; engage and defeat him before supports could reach him. General Barclay de Tolly received directions for this purpose, and he accordingly, in the afternoon of the 19th, made a brisk movement forward to Königswartha, whilst General York marched through Weissig to join General Barclay's corps. The Russians fell in with the enemy at Königswartha, and after a severe battle forced the town with the bayonet, took ten cannons, and put the enemy totally to the rout. Meanwhile General York had fallen in with a strong detachment of the enemy not far from Weissig. The battle was here extremely obstinate, and it soon appeared, that the allied army had to do with three divisions of Marshal Ney's corps, being the very same that were supposed to be still at some leagues distance. The Prussian troops, though much inferior in numbers, sustained this glorious combat against such superior force until night, and kept possession of the field of battle. It was this courageous resistance only that rendered it possible to attain the proposed end, of driving General Lauriston's corps entirely out of the field.

As the enemy had retreated during the night, the corps of Generals Barclay and Von York again moved nearer to the army on the 20th. The result of this day, exclusive of the ten pieces of artillery taken, was 1,500 prisoners, besides a general of division and a general of brigade, and the total destruction of an enemy's column of 9,000 men.

In the battles of Bautzen and Lutzen, the French boasted that only half of their army was up; and that the victory was gained with half their forces. It appeared to be true, that all their forces were not assembled; but it was likewise true, that all the allied force was not in the field. The battle, therefore, was between a part of the allied force and a part of the French. The superiority of troops was evidently upon the side of the Russians; but the superiority of skill and manœuvres was evidently upon the side of the French. Bonaparte, indeed, effected by his skill the mere dint of this superiority, what he could not effect by the battle; he took such a position upon their flanks, as compelled them to quit the ground of the field of battle. The retreat, therefore, of the allies from the field of Lutzen was not because they were beaten, but because they were out-manceuvred. The effect of this retreat, however, was still the same, and was followed by all the disasters, in a degree at least, which are the necessary concomitants upon all retreats. The spirit of the allies was, at least, diminished by it; and the spirits of the French in the same proportion were raised.

This success, (success, at least, in the appearance of its results) had been followed by another of the same kind; and the battle of Bautzen accomplished that effect on the inhabitants of Germany which the battle of Lutzen had begun. The battle of Lutzen shewed, that Bonaparte was not so thoroughly overwhelmed as the expectations of Germany had led every one to expect. The battle of Bautzen produced him still advancing nearer to the Oder.

As to the character of that battle, it was precisely of the same kind as that of Lutzen. It was a battle having every appearance of being a merely drawn one, except the single circumstance of the allies retreating from the ground. Upon ordinary occasions, under general circumstances, there would be no great evil in this, as nothing is more common in successful campaigns, than a mere change of ground. But here the mere circumstance of allowing the advance of Bonaparte, was in itself unhappily a very unfavorable and perilous feature. It added so much to his influence, and therein so much to his means of recruiting his armies.

As to the balance of the losses of the two armies, it was a very reasonable inference, that the French lost more than the Russians and Prussians. This may be concluded from one circumstance—the death of Marshal Duroc. Where, out of four or five marshals in the field, one is killed, it is a natural inference, that the battle must have been very bloody. Bonaparte, indeed, with his usual art, passed this event off as a mere disaster, not resulting from the formidable nature of the battle, but from a chance and last shot of the enemy. But he spoke in the same terms of the death of Marshal Bessieres, Duke of Istria, in his account of the battle of Lutzen. The inference, therefore, is, that the battle was very obstinate and severe, and that the French emperor himself had a very narrow escape.

Count Wittgenstein having resigned the command of the allied armies, which he held after Marshal Kutusoff's death, until definitive arrangements were made, General Barclay de Tolly was appointed to the same by his imperial majesty. Count Wittgenstein was now in command of the Russians, and a new dislocation was to take place: General Blucher was to command all the Prussians. General Milaradevitch gave up for the present (being indisposed) his command to Count Pablin.

The Prussian army, united with the corps of the Russian General Barclay de Tolly, had their bivouac near Haynau, on the 25th of May. On the 26th, they marched in two columns towards Leignitz. The first column was composed of the corps of Barclay de Tolly and D'York; the second, of the corps of General Blucher. The rear-guard halted on the other side of Haynau, in order to oppose the enemy, who usually pushed on from eleven o'clock in the morning till night.

As the enemy advanced, General Blucher ordered his column to retire through the plains of Haynau to Steudentz and Golsdorff, leaving twenty-one squadrons of cavalry, with twenty-two pieces of flying artillery, under the command of General Von Ziethen, in the enemy's rear. General Von Ziethen observed the strength of the enemy from the windmill of Baudinandsdorff, which was ordered to be fired, as a signal for the Prussian cavalry to attack, and for the rear-guard to halt and oppose the enemy.

BOOK X.
CHAP. IX.
1813.

At eleven o'clock the enemy appeared from Haynau, and began to cannonade against the Prussian rear-guard, under the command of Colonel Mulins, which took a position on the heights of Haynau. It was only a reconnoissance of Marshal Ney. About five o'clock in the evening, the enemy defiled from Haynau, and attacked the rear-guard, which retired, according to the preconceived dispositions.

General Von Ziethen, seeing a French division following their rear-guard, resolved to strike a great blow, and, trusting to the gallantry of the troops, gave orders to suffer the enemy to pass on, and to attack him in rear; but their cavalry had already quitted their ambuscade, and advanced against the right flank of the enemy. The windmill was fired, and the whole of the rear-guard made front against the French, who formed themselves in squares.

Dispositions had been made for the horse-artillery to throw the enemy into disorder, at which time the cavalry were to have attacked them; but the impatience of the latter allowed no time for the artillery to produce the desired effect. After one discharge of cannon, the cavalry rushed in upon the enemy's squares, which were successively destroyed. His firing ceased, and a battery of twelve guns, with 1,500 prisoners, fell into the hands of the allied army. When the dust which had concealed him cleared away, we saw the remainder of General Maison's division retreating on Haynau. The battle lasted only half an hour, and not a single man of the infantry was engaged, it having marched towards Leignitz. The brigade of General Von Ziethen alone remained on the heights behind Golsdorff.

On the 28th of May there was a very severe engagement at Ochsenwarder; the Hanseatic legion, Prussians, and English riflemen, made a strong resistance; but owing to a blunder of Captain Muller, who took the French, who were commanded in English, to be English, 1,500 men took possession of Ochsenwarder. Early on the 29th, General Tettenborn informed the senate, that he had no longer the proper means of defence, and left it entirely with the senate what measures they deemed proper to adopt; and he left Hamburg with his Cossacks, at three a. m. May 30, at twelve o'clock, the Danes, 5,000 strong, and with a park of artillery, entered Hamburg, with the French General Bruyere at their head, who took possession of the town in the name of the ruler of France; and at seven p. m. 1,500 French, chiefly gens-d'armes and donaniers, entered Hamburg.

A deputation was sent to the crown-prince at Stralsund, from Hamburg, requesting him to proceed with his whole force to the city, a measure that would ensure it the most effectual protection. The crown-prince replied, that he had the most sincere respect for the city of Hamburg, and hoped that its rights and independence would be ultimately established; but that the whole force and attention of the allies should be directed to one great point and principle—the opposing the main French army under Bonaparte; that if that opposition were successful, the liberties and security of Germany would be the certain result; but that if that were not successful, it was in vain to attempt to render any particular point or city of Germany safe; that, undoubtedly, the Swedish army could protect Hamburg from the force brought against it, but that nothing would please Bonaparte so much as to see the Swedish army so employed, and the allies dividing their force to protect this territory or that city, for he well knew that by such diversion the main force opposed to him would be weakened, and more easily subdued; that then these detached parts of the allied force would give him no serious disturbance or obstacle: and thus the force of the allies, which might have been effectual had they been united, would be broken to pieces and beaten in detail. The Swedish army, he added, was destined to act in one body in another part of Germany, and he trusted its employment there would in the end prove of more real advantage to Hamburg, then had he complied with the wishes of the deputation.

An armistice was concluded at this time between the French and part of the allied armies, preparatory to a congress to be held at Prague for a general peace, at which ministers from every power interested in the war were to attend. Thus Bonaparte endeavoured to convince the French public that he would spare no pains to obtain an honorable peace.

Notwithstanding this armistice, hostilities still prevailed in some parts: General Czernicheff had a brilliant affair with the enemy near Halberstadt. He passed the Elbe at Ferchland on the night of May the 16th, and proceeded in the direction of Burgstall; here he learnt, from various letters which had been intercepted by his parties, that a large convoy of artillery, escorted by about 2,000 men, were to pass the night of the 17th at Halberstadt. His horses having been sufficiently rested, and being in the best possible condition, he resolved on going the fifteen miles (German), which was the distance to Halberstadt, without halting. To his great surprise, he succeeded in Performing the whole of this distance, without stopping, in thirty hours. On his arrival at Hadmersleben, he learnt that a second convoy was at Hesse, on the Brunswick road, three miles and a half from Halberstadt, where it was intended to arrive in the morning to join the first, in the view of proceeding with greater safety on its march to the grand army. This last convoy was escorted by 4,000 infantry, 500 cavalry, and many pieces of artillery. Notwithstanding the fatigue of his men and horses, after so harassing a march, he resolved to continue his route, and to make an immediate attack upon the enemy at Halberstadt, before the arrival of the reinforcement; in order to take advantage of the fault he had committed, in placing his guns and the convoy outside of the town, although at a very short distance from the walls. After reconnoitring at four o'clock in the morning, General Czernicheff ascertained that the enemy had placed his guns in a square, the middle of which was filled with ammunition-waggons and other carriages, and was lined with infantry, the flanks being covered by 250 horse. The whole formed a sort of fortress, almost impenetrable to cavalry. One of his first cares having been to cut off the enemy from the town, a single gate which the enemy had neglected to close, afforded him the means of getting possession of the town, where the brave Colonel Trecoff charged the rear of the troops which were marching out to join the square, and pursued them very nearly up to the guns. On the other side, Colonel Wlassaw, whom he had sent forward with two regiments, in hopes of surprising the enemy, made two very fine charges against the square; but the enemy having notice of their march, and being upon their guard, he could not make any impression. The enemy now opened a heavy cannonade from fourteen guns, to which the general could only oppose two; by the fire of which, however, five of the enemy's ammunition-waggons were blown up. One of his met with the same fate, and four horses were killed.

At this moment, a regiment of Cossacks, which he had detached upon the road by which the enemy's reinforcements were advancing, brought him intelligence that they were within two miles of him; this determined him to make a general and decisive effort against the square with all his troops. With this view he ordered all the scattered Cossacks to seize the same moment at which the attack would be made by the regular cavalry. After exhorting his soldiers to do their duty, he ordered all his people to charge at the same moment. This brilliant attack against a formidable square, defended by fourteen pieces of cannon, surpassed his expectations, and covered with glory the hussars of Isoum, commanded by Colonel Tieman, and two regiments of Riga dragoons; the Cossacks also seconded admirably the efforts of these 400 horse. In an instant the batteries were carried, and the brave men were in the middle of the square: there the carnage was horrible, as the enemy defended himself obstinately, even firing upon them from under the carriages. More than 700 were killed, and the rest taken, for not an individual escaped out of all this corps. Scarcely was the slaughter terminated, when the enemy's column began to appear, pressing upon the Cossacks. General Czernicheff was then obliged to support them, in order to gain time to send off the captured guns and prisoners. From want of time he could carry off only the fourteen guns and twelve ammunition-waggons; he blew up the rest in the very presence of the enemy. He destroyed or distributed to the inhabitants all the stores which were in the town, and at seven in the evening he retired with his booty to Coehstedt.

Halberstadt, the scene of this battle, is a town about 100 English miles south-east of Hamburg, and upon the high road between that city and Brunswick, and about 300 miles from the positions of the two main armies of the allies and the French: the intelligence of the armistice had therefore not reached that part of the country at this period.

Immediately on the signature of the armistice, the allied armies moved their head-quarters to Reichenbach. The greatest harmony prevailed among the allied sovereigns, and both armies were in a complete state of equipment; each individual corps having continually gained advantages over the enemy during the retreat, in every action which had been fought, though they had been obliged to yield to numerical superiority. The terms of the armistice were considered highly favorable to the allies, who would very shortly receive large reinforcements; and the evacuation of Breslau by the French, evinced that it had not been dictated by Bonaparte in the same spirit which appeared in former instruments of this kind.

Barclay de Tolly was commander-in-chief at Reichenbach. Wittgenstein and Blücher remained in the post of Schweidnitz.

Austria having recalled her troops from the French army, and augmented her force in Bohemia, plenipotentiaries were appointed by Russia, Prussia, and France, to state to Austria their different bases of a treaty of peace. These plenipotentiaries arrived at Prague, July 12, and the armistice, at the request of Austria, was extended to August 10.

The Emperor of Austria, who, as intimated in a former chapter, was unwilling to consider his son-in-law as an enemy, now insisted on the evacuation of the Prussian fortresses by the French, the removal of the French troops to the 1813.

BOOK X.

CHAP. IX.

Rhine, the abandonment of the Rhenish confederation, and generally the evacuation of all those parts of Germany seized by the enemy. This projet was transmitted to Bonaparte, with an intimation that the Emperor of Austria would expect a reply before the 10th of August. No reply was returned, and the armistice was denounced on the 10th. Austria declared war against France on the 11th, the following having been the manifesto of the Emperor of Austria on this occasion :—

“ The Austrian monarchy has been compelled by its situation, by its various connections with the other powers, and its importance in the confederacy of European states, to engage in most of those wars which have ravaged Europe for upwards of twenty years. Throughout the progress of these arduous struggles, the same political principle has invariably directed his imperial majesty. A lover of peace from a sense of duty, from his own natural feelings, and from attachment to his people; free from all ambitious thoughts of conquest and aggrandizement; his majesty has only taken up arms when called by the urgent necessity of self-preservation, by an anxiety for the fate of contiguous states inseparable from his own, or by the danger of beholding the entire social system of Europe a prey to a lawless and absolute power. To promote justice and order have been the object of his majesty's life and reign; for these alone have Austria contended. If in these frequently unsuccessful contests deep wounds have been inflicted on the monarchy, still his majesty had the consolation to reflect, that the fate of his empire had not been hazarded upon needless and violent enterprizes; that all his decisions were justifiable before God, his people, his contemporaries, and posterity.

“ Notwithstanding the most ample preparations, the war in 1809 would have brought the state to ruin, had not the ever-memorable bravery of the army, and the spirit of true patriotism which animated all parts of the monarchy, overbalanced every adverse occurrence. The honor of the nation and its ancient renown in arms, were happily upheld during all the mischances of this war; but valuable provinces were lost; and Austria, by the cession of the countries bordering upon the Adriatic, was deprived of all share in maritime commerce, one of the most efficient means of promoting her industry; a blow which would have been still more sensibly felt, had not at the same time the whole continent been closed by a general and destructive system, preventing all commercial intercourse, and almost suspending all communication amongst nations.

“ The progress and result of this war fully satisfied his majesty, that in the obvious impossibility of an immediate and thorough improvement of the political condition of Europe, shaken as it was to its very foundation, the exertions of individual states in their own defence, instead of setting bounds to the general distress, would only tend to destroy the little strength they still retained, would hasten the fall of the whole, and even destroy all hopes of future and better times. Under this conviction, his majesty foresaw the important advantage that would result from a peace, which, if secured for some years, might check this overgrown and hitherto irresistible power, might allow his monarchy that repose which was indispensable to the restoration of his finances and his army, and at the same time procure to the neighbouring states a period of relaxation, which, if improved with prudence and activity, might prepare the way to more fortunate times. Such a peace, under the existing circumstances of danger, was only to be obtained by an extraordinary effort. The emperor was sensible of it, and made this effort: for the preservation of the empire, for the most sacred interests of mankind, as a security against immeasurable evils, as a pledge of a better order of things, his majesty sacrificed what was dearest to his heart. With this view, exalted above all common scruples, armed against every misconception of the moment, an alliance was formed which was intended by a sense of some security to reanimate the weaker and more suffering party, after the miseries of an unsuccessful struggle, to incline the stronger and victorious one to a course of moderation and justice, without which the community of states can only be considered as a community of misery.

“ His majesty was the more justified in these expectations, because at the time of the consummation of this union, the Emperor Napoleon had attained that point of his career when the preservation of his conquests was a more natural and desirable object, than a restless struggle after new possessions. Any farther extension of his dominions, long since outstretching their proper limits, was attended with evident danger, not only to France, already sinking under the burthen of his conquests, but even to his own real personal interests. What his authority gained in extent, it necessarily lost in point of security. By an union with the most ancient imperial family in Christendom, the edifice of his greatness acquired in the eyes of the French nation, and of the world, such an addition of strength and perfection, that any ulterior scheme of aggrandisement must only weaken and destroy its stability. What France, what Europe, what so many oppressed and despairing nations earnestly demanded of heaven, a sound policy prescribed to the triumphant ruler as a law of self-preservation—and it was allowed to hope that so many great and united motives would prevail over the ambition of an individual.

“If these flattering prospects were destroyed, it is not to be imputed to Austria. After many years’ fruitless exertions, after boundless sacrifices of every description, there existed sufficient motives for the attempt to procure a better order of things by confidence and concession, when streams of blood had hitherto produced nothing but misery and destruction; nor can his majesty ever regret that he has been induced to attempt it.

“The year 1810 was not yet closed, the war still raged in Spain, the people of Germany had scarcely been allowed a sufficient time to recover from the devastations of the two former wars, when, in an evil hour, the Emperor Napoleon resolved to unite a considerable portion of the north of Germany with the mass of countries which bore the name of the French empire, and to rob the ancient free commercial cities of Hamburg, Bremen, and Lubeck, first of their political, and shortly after of their commercial existence, and with that, of their means of subsistence. This violent step was adopted, without any even plausible pretensions, in contempt of every decent form, without any previous declaration, or communication with any other cabinet, under the arbitrary, and futile pretext that the war with England required it.

“This cruel system, which was intended to destroy the commerce of the world, at the expence of the independence, the prosperity, the rights and dignity, and in utter ruin of the public and private property of all the continental powers, was pursued with unrelenting severity, in the vain expectation of forcing a result, which, had it not fortunately proved unattainable, would have plunged Europe, for a long time to come, into a state of poverty, impotence, and barbarity.

“The decree by which a new French dominion was established on the German coasts, under the title of a thirty-second military division, was in itself sufficiently calculated to raise the suspicions of the adjoining states, and it was the more alarming to them as the forerunner of future and greater dangers. By this decree it became evident, that the system which had been created in France (although previously transgressed, yet still proclaimed to be in existence), the system of the pretended natural limits of the French empire, was, without any further justification or explanation, overthrown, and even the emperor’s arbitrary acts were in the same arbitrary manner annihilated. Neither the princes of the Rhenish confederacy, nor the kingdom of Westphalia, no territory, great or small, was spared, in the accomplishment of this dreadful usurpation. The boundary drawn apparently by blind caprice, without either rule or plan, without any consideration of ancient or more recent political relations, intersected rivers and countries, cut off the middle and southern states of Germany from all connection with the German sea, passed the Elbe, separated Denmark from Germany, laid its pretensions even to the Baltic, and seemed to be rapidly approaching the line of Prussian fortresses still occupied on the Oder; and so little did this act of usurpation (however powerfully it affected all rights and possessions, all geographic, political, and military lines of demarcation) carry with it a character of determinate and complete accession of territory, that it was impossible to view it in any other light than as a forerunner of still greater usurpations, by which one half of Germany was to become a French province, and the Emperor Napoleon the absolute ruler of the Continent.

“To Russia and Prussia this unnatural extension of the French territory could not fail of producing the most serious alarm. The latter, surrounded on all sides, no longer capable of free action, deprived of every means of obtaining fresh strength, appeared hastening to its dissolution. Russia, already in fear for her western frontier, by the conversion of the city of Dantzic, declared a free city by the treaty of Tilsit, into a French military port, and of a great part of Poland into a French province, could not but see, in the advance of the French dominion along the sea-coast, and in the new chains prepared for Prussia, the imminent danger of her German and Polish possessions. From this moment, therefore, the rupture between France and Russia was as good as decided.

“Not without deep and just anxiety did Austria observe the storm which was gathering. The scene of hostilities would, in every case, be contiguous to her provinces, which, owing to the necessary reform in the financial system which had cramped the restoration of her military means, were in a very defenceless state. In a higher point of view, the struggle which awaited Russia appeared still more doubtful, as it commenced under the same unfavorable conjuncture of affairs, with the same want of co-operation on the part of other powers, and with the same disproportion in their relative means, consequently was just as hopeless as all former struggles of the same nature. His majesty, the emperor, made every effort in his power by friendly mediation with both parties to avert the impending storm. No human judgment could, at that time, foresee that the period was so near at hand, when the failure of these friendly attempts should prove more injurious to the Emperor Napoleon than to his opponents. Thus, however, it was resolved by the wisdom of Providence.

“When the commencement of hostilities was no longer doubtful, his majesty was compelled to

BOOK X.

CHAP. IX.

1813.

BOOK X.

CHAP. IX.

1813.

have recourse to measures which, in so unnatural and dangerous a conjuncture, might combine his own security with just considerations for the real interests of neighbouring states. The system of unarmed inaction, the only neutrality which the Emperor Napoleon, according to his own declarations, would have permitted, was, by every sound maxim of policy, wholly inadmissible, and would, at last, have proved only a vain endeavour to shrink from the approaching trial. A power so important as Austria, could not renounce all participation in the interests of Europe, nor could she place herself in a situation in which, equally ineffective in peace or war, she would lose her voice and influence in all great negotiations, without acquiring any guarantee for the security of her own frontier. To prepare for war against France would have been, under the existing circumstances, as little consonant with equity as with prudence. The Emperor Napoleon has given his majesty no personal ground for hostile proceedings; and the prospect of attaining many beneficial results, by a skilful employment of the established friendly relations, by confidential representations, and by conciliatory councils, had not yet been abandoned as hopeless. And with regard to the immediate interest of their state, such a revolution would inevitably have been attended with this consequence—that the Austrian territory would have become the first and principal seat of war, which with its well known deficiency of means of defence could, in a short time, have overthrown the monarchy.

“In this painful situation his majesty had no other resource than to take the field on the side of France. To take up arms for France, in the real sense of the word, would have been a measure not only in contradiction with the duties and principles of the emperor, but even with the repeated declarations of his cabinet, which had, without any reserve, disapproved of this war.—On the signature of the treaty of the 12th of March, 1812, his majesty proceeded upon two distinct principles: the first, as is proved by the words of the treaty, was to leave no means untried which might sooner or later obtain a peace; the other was to place himself internally and externally in a position which, if it should prove impossible to effect a peace, or in case the turn of the war should render decisive measures in this part necessary, would enable Austria to act with independence, and in either of these cases to adopt the measures which a just and wise policy should prescribe. Upon this principle it was that only a fixed and comparative small part of the army was destined to co-operate in the war; the other military resources, at that time in a state of readiness, or that still remained to be prepared, were not called forth for the prosecution of this war. By a kind of tacit agreement between the belligerents, the Austrian territory was even treated as neutral. The real ends and views of the system adopted by his majesty could not escape the notice of France, Russia, or any intelligent observer.

“The campaign of 1812 furnished a memorable example of the failure of an undertaking supported by gigantic powers, conducted by a captain of the first rank, when, in the confidence of great military talents, he despises the rules of prudence, and outsteps the bounds of nature. The illusion of glory carried the Emperor Napoleon into the heart of the Russian empire; and a false political view of things induced him to imagine, that he should dictate a peace in Moscow, should cripple the Russian power for half a century, and then return victorious. When the magnanimous constancy of the Emperor of Russia, the glorious deeds of his warriors, and the unshaken fidelity of his people, put an end to this dream, it was too late to repent it with impunity. The whole French army was scattered and destroyed: in less than four months we have seen the theatre of war transferred from the Dnieper and the Dwina to the Oder and the Elbe.

“This rapid and extraordinary change of fortune was the forerunner of an important revolution in all the political relations of Europe. The confederacy of Russia, Great Britain, and Sweden, presented a point of union to all neighbouring states. Prussia, whom report had long declared determined to risk all, to prefer even the danger of immediate political destruction to the lingering sufferings of continued oppression, seized the favorable moment, and threw herself into the arms of the allies. Many greater and smaller princes of Germany were ready to do the same. Every where the ardent desires of the people anticipated the regular proceedings of their governments. Their impatience to live in independence, and under their own laws, the sentiment of wounded national honor, and the hatred of a foreign dominion, broke out in bright flames on all sides.

“His majesty, the emperor, too intelligent not to consider this change of affairs as the natural and necessary consequence of a previous violent political convulsion, and too just to view it in anger, was solely bent upon securing, by deep digested and well-combined measures, the real and permanent interest of the European commonwealth. Already, in the beginning of December, considerable steps had been taken on the part of the Austrian cabinet, in order to dispose the Emperor Napoleon to quiet and peaceful policy, on grounds which equally interested the world and his own welfare. These steps were from time to time renewed and enforced. Hopes had been entertained, that the impression of last year's campaign, the recollection of the fruitless sacrifice of an immense army, the severe measures of every description that would be necessary to replace that loss, the decided declination of France, and of all other nations connected with her, to a war, which, without any prospect of future indemnification, exhausted and ruined her internal strength; that, lastly, even a calm reflection on the doubtful issue of this new and highly imminent crisis, would move the emperor to listen to the representations of Austria. The tone of these representations was carefully adapted to the circumstances of the times, serious as the greatness of the object, moderate as the desire of a favorable issue, and as the existing friendly relations required.

"That overtures, flowing from so pure a motive should be decidedly rejected, could not certainly be foreseen. But the manner in which they were received, and still more the striking contrast between the sentiments entertained by Austria and the whole conduct of the Emperor Napoleon, to the period of these unsuccessful endeavours for peace, soon destroyed the best hopes that were entertained. Instead of endeavouring, by a moderate language, to improve, at least, our view of the future, and to lessen the general despondency, it was, on every occasion, solemnly declared before the highest authorities in France, that the emperor would hear of no proposition for peace that should violate the integrity of the French empire, in the French sense of the word, or that should make any pretensions to the arbitrarily incorporated provinces.

"At the same time, eventual conditions, with which this self-created boundary did not even appear to have any relation, were spoken of; at one time menacing indignation, at another with bitter contempt; as if it had not been possible to declare in terms sufficiently distinct, the resolution of the Emperor Napoleon, not to make to the repose of the world even one single nominal sacrifice.

"These hostile demonstrations were attended with this particular mortification to Austria, that they placed even the invitations to peace which this cabinet, with the knowledge and apparent consent of France, made to other courts, in a false and highly disadvantageous light. The sovereigns united against France, instead of any answer to Austria's propositions for negotiation, and her offers of mediation, laid before her the public declarations of the French emperor. And when, in the month of March, his majesty sent a minister to London, to invite England to share in a negotiation for peace, the British ministry replied, "that they would not believe Austria still entertained any hopes of peace, when the Emperor Napoleon had, in the mean time, expressed sentiments which could only tend to the perpetuation of war;" a declaration which was the more painful to his majesty, the more it was just and well-founded.

"Austria, however, did not, upon this account, cease to impress, in more forcible and distinct terms, the necessity of peace, upon the mind of the Emperor of France; directed in all her measures by this principle, that, as all order and balance of power in Europe had been destroyed by the boundless superiority of France, no real peace was to be expected, unless that superiority were diminished. His majesty in the mean time adopted every necessary measure to strengthen and concentrate his armies; sensible that Austria must be prepared for war, if her mediation were not to be entirely unavailing. His imperial majesty had moreover been long since persuaded, that the probability of an immediate share in the war would no longer be excluded from his calculations. The actual state of things could not be continued; of this the emperor was convinced: this conviction was the main-spring of his actions, and was naturally strengthened by the failure of any attempt to procure a peace. The result was apparent. By one means or the other, either by negotiation or by force of arms, a new state of things must be effected.

"The Emperor Napoleon was not only aware of the Austrian preparations for war, but even acknowledged them as necessary, and justified them in more than one instance. He had sufficient reason to believe, that his majesty the emperor, at so decisive a period for the fate of the whole world, would lay aside all personal and momentary feelings, would alone consult the lasting welfare of Austria, and of the countries by which she is surrounded, and would resolve nothing but what this great motive should impose as a duty upon him. The Austrian cabinet had never expressed itself in terms that would warrant any other construction; and yet the French did not only acknowledge that the Austrian mediation could only be an armed mediation, but declared upon more than one occasion, that Austria, under existing circumstances, ought no longer to confine herself to act a secondary part, but should appear in force upon the stage, and decide as a great and independent power. Whatever the French government could either hope or fear from Austria, this acknowledgment was of itself a previous justification of the whole intended and hitherto adopted measures of his imperial majesty.

"Thus far were circumstances developed when the Emperor Napoleon left Paris, in order to make head against the progress of the allied armies. Even their enemies have done homage to the valour of the Russian and Prussian troops in the sanguinary actions of the month of May. That, however the result of this first period of the campaign was not more favorable to them, was owing partly to the great numerical superiority of the French force, and to the universally acknowledged military talents of their leader, and partly to the political combinations, by which the allied sovereigns were guided in all their undertakings. They acted under the just supposition, that a cause like the one in which they were engaged, could not possibly be confined to themselves; that sooner or later, whether successful or unfortunate, every state which still preserved a shadow of independence must join their confederacy, every independent army must act with them. They, therefore, did not allow further scope to the bravery of their troops, than the moment required, and preserved a considerable part of their strength for a period when, with more extended means, they might look to the attainment of greater objects. For the same cause, and with a view to the developement of events, they consented to the armistice.

BOOK X
CHAP. IX.
1813.

"In the mean time the retreat of the allies had for the moment given an appearance to the war, which daily became more interesting to the emperor, from the impossibility, if it should proceed, of his remaining an inactive spectator of it. The fate of the Prussian monarchy was a point which peculiarly attracted the attention of his majesty, feeling, as the emperor did, that the restoration of the Prussian monarchy was the first step towards that of the whole political system of Europe, and he viewed the danger in which she now stood, as equally affecting himself. Already, in the month of April, had the Emperor Napoleon suggested to the Austrian cabinet, that he considered the dissolution of the Prussian monarchy as a natural consequence of her defection from France, and of the continuation of the war, and that it now only depended upon Austria to add the most important and most flourishing of her provinces to its own state; a suggestion which shewed distinctly enough, that no means could properly be neglected to save that power. If this great object could not be obtained by a just peace, it was necessary to support Russia and Prussia by a powerful co-operation. From this natural view of things, upon which even France could no longer deceive herself, his majesty continued his preparations with unwearied activity. He quitted, in the early part of July, his residence, and proceeded to the vicinity of the scene of action, in order the more effectually to conduct the preparations for war, if no other choice should remain for Austria.

"A short time before, the Emperor Napoleon had declared, "that he had proposed a congress to be held at Prague, where plenipotentiaries from France, the United States of North America, Denmark, the King of Spain, and the other allied princes on the one hand, and on the other, plenipotentiaries of England, Russia, Prussia, the Spanish insurgents, and the other allies of this hostile mass, should meet, and lay the groundwork of a durable peace." To whom this proposition was addressed, in what manner, in what diplomatic form, through whose organ it could have been done, was perfectly unknown to the Austrian cabinet, which only was made acquainted with the circumstance through the medium of the public prints. How, too, such a project could be brought to bear—how from the combination of such dissimilar elements, without any generally acknowledged principle, without any previously regulated plan, a negociation for peace was to be set on foot, was so little to be comprehended, that it was very allowable to consider the whole proposition rather as a play of the imagination, than as a serious invitation to the adoption of a great political measure.

"Perfectly acquainted with all the obstacles to a general peace, Austria had long considered whether this distant and difficult object was not rather to be attained progressively; and, in this opinion, had expressed herself both to France and to Russia and Prussia, upon the subject of a continental peace. Not that the Austrian court had misconceived, even for a moment, the necessity and importance of an universal peace among all the great powers of Europe, and without which there was no hope of either safety or happiness, or had imagined that the continent could exist, if the separation of England were not invariably considered as a most deadly evil! The negociation which Austria proposed, after the alarming declaration of France had nearly destroyed all hopes of England uniting her endeavours in the attempt to procure a general peace, was an essential part of the great approaching negociation for a general and effective congress for peace; it was intended as preparatory to this, to draw up the preliminary articles of the future treaty, to pave the way, by a long continental armistice, to a more extended and durable negociation. Had the principle upon which Austria advanced been other than this, neither Russia nor Prussia, bound by the strongest ties to England, would certainly ever have listened to the proposals of the Austrian cabinet.

"After the Russian and Prussian courts, animated by a confidence in his majesty, highly flattering to the emperor, had already declared their concurrence in the proposed congress under the mediation of Austria, it became necessary to obtain the formal assent of the Emperor Napoleon, and to determine upon what principles the negociations for peace were to be carried on. For this purpose, his imperial majesty resolved, towards the end of the month of June, to send his minister for foreign affairs to Dresden. The result of this mission was a convention concluded upon the 30th of June, accepting the mediation of his imperial majesty in the negociation of a general, and if that could not be effected, of a preliminary continental peace. The city of Prague was fixed upon for the meeting of the congress, and the 5th of July for the day of its opening. In order to obtain a sufficient time for the negotiation, it was determined by the same convention, that the Emperor Napoleon should not give notice of the rupture of the armistice which was to terminate on the 20th of July, at that time existing between himself and Russia, till the 10th of August; and his majesty the emperor took upon himself to obtain a similar declaration from the Russian and Prussian courts.

"The points which had been determined in Dresden, were hereupon imparted to the two courts. Although the continuation of the armistice was attended with many objections, and with much serious inconvenience to them, the desire of giving to his imperial majesty another proof of their confidence, and at the same time to satisfy the world that they would not reject any prospect of peace, however confined it might be, that they would not refuse any attempt which might prepare the way to it, overcame every consideration. The only alteration made in the convention of the 30th of June, was, that the term of the opening the congress, since the final regulations could not so soon be determined, should be deferred until the 12th of July.

"In the mean time his majesty, who would not as yet abandon all hopes of completely terminating, by a general peace, the sufferings of mankind, and the convulsions of the political world, had also resolved upon a new attempt with the British government. The Emperor Napoleon not only received the proposal with apparent approbation, but even voluntarily offered to expedite the business, by allowing the persons to be dispatched for that purpose to England a passage through France. When it was to be carried into effect, unexpected difficulties arose, the passports were delayed from time to time, under trifling pretexts, and at length entirely refused. This proceeding afforded a fresh and important ground for entertaining just doubts as to the sincerity of the assurances which the Emperor Napoleon had more than once publicly expressed of his disposition to peace, although several of his expressions, at that particular period, afforded just reason to believe that a maritime peace was the object of his most anxious solicitude.

"During that interval, their majesties the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia had nominated their plenipotentiaries to the congress, and had furnished them with very decisive instructions. On the 12th of July they both arrived at Prague, as well as his majesty's minister, charged with the concerns of the mediation.

"The negotiations were not to be protracted beyond the 10th of August, except in the event of their assuming such a character as to induce a confident hope of a favorable result. To that day the armistice had been extended through the mediation of Austria: the political and military situation of the allied sovereigns, the condition of the countries they occupied, and their anxious wish to terminate an irksome period of uncertainty, prevented any further extension of it. With all these circumstances the Emperor Napoleon was acquainted; he well knew that the period of the negotiations was necessarily defined by that of the armistice; and he could not moreover conceal from himself how much his own determinations would influence the happy abridgment and successful result of the pending negotiations.

"It was therefore with real sorrow that his majesty soon perceived, not only that no serious step was taken by France to accelerate this great work, but, on the contrary, it appeared as if a procrastination of the negotiations, and evasion of a favorable issue, had been decidedly intended. There was, indeed, a French minister at the place of congress, but without any orders to proceed to business, until the appearance of the first plenipotentiary.

"The arrival of that plenipotentiary was in vain expected from day to day. Nor was it until the 21st of July that it was ascertained that a demur, which took place on settling the renewal of the armistice between the French and Russian and Prussian Commissioners, an obstruction of very subordinate importance, having no influence whatever upon the congress, and which might have been very easily and speedily removed by the interference of Austria, was made use of as the justification of this extraordinary delay. And when this last pretext was removed, it was not until the 28th of July, sixteen days after that appointed for the opening of the congress, that the first French plenipotentiary arrived.

"Even in the very first days after this minister's arrival, no doubt remained as to the fate of the congress. The form in which the full powers were to be delivered, and the mutual explanations should be conducted, a point which had already been treated by all parties, became the object of a discussion which rendered all the endeavours of the mediating power abortive. The apparent insufficiency of the powers intrusted to the French negotiator, occasioned a silence of several days. Nor was it until the 6th of August that this minister gave in a new declaration, by which the difficulties with respect to forms were by no means removed, nor the negotiation by one step brought nearer to its object. After an useless exchange of notes upon every preliminary question, the 10th of August arrived. The Prussian and Russian negotiators could not exceed this term: the congress was at an end, and the resolution which Austria had to form was previously determined, by the progress of this negotiation—by the actual conviction of the impossibility of peace—by the no longer doubtful point of view in which his majesty examined the great question in dispute—by the principles and intentions of the allies, wherein the emperor recognized his own—and, finally, by the former positive declarations, which left no room for misconception.

BOOK X.

CHAP. IX.

1813.

“Not without sincere affliction, and alone consoled by the certainty that every means to avoid the war had been exhausted, does the emperor now find himself compelled to action. For three years has his majesty laboured, with unceasing perseverance, to effect, by mild and conciliatory measures, a real and durable peace for Austria and for Europe. All his endeavours have failed: there is now no remedy, no recourse to be had but to arms. The emperor takes them up without any personal animosity, from a painful necessity, from an irresistible duty, upon grounds which any faithful citizen of his realm, which the world, which the Emperor Napoleon himself, in a moment of tranquillity and reason, will acknowledge and justify. The necessity of this war is engraven in the heart of every Austrian, of every European, under whosoever dominion he may live, in such legible characters, that no art is necessary to distinguish them. The nation and the army will do their duty. An union established by common necessity, and by the mutual interest of every power that is in arms for its independence, will give due weight to our exertions; and the result, with the assistance of heaven, will be such as must fulfil the just expectations of every friend of order and of peace.”

The forces which the allies brought into the field, were very numerous. The line of operations being very extensive, they were divided into three main armies. The first, which might be termed the grand Bohemian army, and estimated at 180,000 men, was under the command of Prince Schwartzemberg. This army was posted on the Ersburg mountains, in the neighbourhood of Culm, within twenty miles of Dresden. The second, termed the Silesian army, and amounting to 100,000 men, was commanded by General Blucher. The third army, under the orders of the Crown-prince of Sweden, was stationed in Brandenburg, for the defence of Berlin, and consisted of 110,000 men.

In the orders given by Prince Von Schwartzemberg to his army, August 17, he observed: “We do not singly undertake this combat: we stand in the same ranks with all that Europe has to oppose of greatness and activity, against the powerful opponent of her peace and liberty. Austria, Russia, Prussia, Sweden, England, Spain—all join their united endeavors for the same end, for a well-founded and durable peace, a reasonable distribution of strength among the different states, and the independence of every single power. It is not against France, but against the domineering power of France out of her own borders, that this great alliance has raised itself.”

Hostilities recommenced with several advantages on the side of the allied armies. General Moreau was appointed second in command of the allied army under Prince Schwartzemberg. This general was more reputed for the merit of his retreat through the Black Forest and the Valley of Hell (1796) than Bonaparte for the battle of Marengo, as the merit of that battle chiefly belonged to the celebrated Desaix, who saved the army at the expense of his own life. But the retreat through the Black Forest belonged entirely to Moreau; and the Austrians, as well as the French, were so penetrated with the merit of it, that the Archduke Charles would not suffer the pillar to be defaced upon which the French soldiers had recorded this retreat; a singular proof both of the value of this military act, and of the generosity of the archduke.

An important victory was obtained by the Crown-prince of Sweden. On the 21st of August the Emperor Napoleon was concentrating the corps of the Dukes of Reggio and Belluno, and Padua, and of Generals Bertrand and Regnier, forming more than 70,000 men, in the environs of Bareuth, and every thing announcing on the part of his troops a rapid march upon Berlin, the prince-royal made the following dispositions.

The third Prussian corps, commanded by Bulow, placed two divisions between Hernalsdorf and Klein Berin. One division occupied Mittenwalde and another Trebbin, in order to mask the whole movement. The fourth Prussian corps, under Tauenzin, united at Blankenfelde. The Swedish army left Potsdam on the 22d, at two a. m. proceeded upon Saarmund, passed the defiles, and took post at Ruhlsdorf. The Russian army followed the Swedish army and took post at Gutergatze. General Czernicheff guarded Beletz and Treunbritzen with 3,000 Cossacks and a brigade of light infantry.

The secret agents announced that the Emperor Napoleon was to pass by Luckau to proceed to Bareuth. General Czernicheff executed his orders with his usual intelligence, and carried alarm and uneasiness to the rear of the enemy's columns. General Hinchfeldt, who had received orders to proceed from the environs of Magdeburgh to Brandenburg and Potsdam, and from Potsdam to Saarmund, made a rapid movement of five Swedish miles in ten hours.

Affairs were in this state when the enemy attacked General Thumen at Trebbin, on the 22d, in the morning. Their superiority determined the general to evacuate that post. The enemy advanced successively, and occupied all the interval between Mittenwald and the Saare, covered by woods and flanked by marshes. The advanced posts fell back slowly, and covered the front of the line. On the 23d, in the morning, the corps of General Bertrand debouched upon General Tauenzeln. The latter repulsed him, and made some prisoners.

The village of Gross Beren, against which the 7th French corps and a strong reserve was directed, was taken by him. The Duke of Reggio's corps proceeded upon Ahrendorff. By the occupation of Gross Beren the enemy was at 1,000 toises from the centre of the camp. General Bulow received orders to attack it; he executed it with the decision of a skilful general. The cannonade was warm for some hours. The troops advanced under the protection of the artillery, and fell with the bayonet upon the 7th corps, which had deployed in the plain, and which marched boldly upon the camp. There were several charges of cavalry against the corps of the Duke of Padua, which did great honor to the Prussian general, Oppen. The Russian and Swedish army were in battle, and waited the deploying of the other enemy's corps to attack them at the same time. General Winzingerode was at the head of 10,000 horse, and the Count de Woronzow at the head of the Russian infantry. Marshal Count Stedingk, in front of the Swedish line, had his cavalry in reserve.

The village of Ruhlsdorff, situated in front of his camp, was furnished with infantry, in order to keep open the communication with General Bulow. The other corps of the enemy's army not having debouched from the woods, the Russian and Swedish army did not stir.

However, the enemy menacing the village of Ruhlsdorff, and having already pushed his tirailleurs against the light Swedish troops placed in front of that village, the prince ordered some battalions, supported by artillery, to re-inforce the advanced posts, and Colonel Cardell was directed to push on with a battalion of flying-artillery to take the enemy in flank.

Hitherto the results of the affair of Gross Beren were twenty-six cannon, thirty caissons, much baggage, and 1,500 prisoners, among whom were forty officers, and the colonel of Uhlaas of the Saxon guard, and several lieutenant-colonels and French majors. The number of killed and wounded of the enemy was very considerable, and the woods were filled with stragglers, whom the light cavalry were bringing in every moment.

The enemy retired beyond Trebbin, which was already occupied by two regiments of Cossacks. Generals Bulow, Tauenzeln, and O'Rourke were in pursuit of the enemy, as well as the whole light Russian cavalry.

The prince-royal found among the prisoners, officers and soldiers who had served under his orders, and who shed tears of joy in seeing their old general again.

Four important victories were afterwards rapidly obtained by the allied armies—first, that of Dresden;—secondly, that over Vandamme at Culm and Toplitz;—thirdly, that of Blucher over Macdonald on the Katzbach;—and fourthly, that of the crown-prince over Ney near Wittenberg.

The circumstances of the first battle, the attack of Dresden, were as follow:—The allied armies, upon the denunciation of the armistice, were for the greater part posted on the further side of the mountains of Bohemia; the French armies being at Dresden, and between that town and the foot of the same Bohemian mountains on the side of Saxony. Bonaparte had selected Dresden as a post almost in the centre of Germany, stretching over both sides of the Elbe, and presenting a strong fortress on the right and left bank of this river. Dresden, which the Prussians, in their former wars, under Frederick the Great, were accustomed to enter almost without a siege, was, by the forethought and genius of Bonaparte, erected into an entrenched camp, and improved into an almost impenetrable fortress. Here he concentrated his forces, and prepared for the attack of the allies. Now, upon the commencement of the campaign, the plan of the allies was double,—in the first place they divided their army into two parts, each of which was to take its own line of operation. One of these divisions, under the Prussian general, Blucher, was to march directly forwards, and to threaten the enemy in front. The other division, composed of the main Russian army, under the command of Barclay de Tolly, as likewise of General Kleist's Prussian corps, and nearly the whole of the Austrian army, was to move at the same time on a line immediately to Dresden, and thus to direct itself towards the enemy's flank and rear, whilst Blucher was advancing against their front.

The first and principal division, thus directed against Dresden, accordingly moved upon the projected line on the days of the 20th and 21st of August, and on the night of the 26th, the allied army were encamped in front of Dresden. On the following morning, the enemy withdrew from the surrounding ground into the town, and it was accordingly determined to attack them in their very entrenchments. This attack was one of the most gallant achievements in the war, and failed of success only because the walls were too strong to be taken by a coup de main. The enemy, covered by his entrenchments, was thus enabled to repel the assault; and the allies, after repeated efforts, retreated. This retreat, in the language of Bonaparte, was converted into a victory upon his own part; but what must have been the spirit of the allied army, which could have led them, instead of awaiting his attack, to issue from the passes of Bohemia in search of him, and to attack him in the very centre of his strong hold. All the circumstances of this affair display the spirit which animated the allies; and the retreat itself was marked with all the results of victory.

BOOK X.

CHAP. IX.

1813.

The second of these victories was that over Vandamme, near Culm and Toplitz. The allied armies, having been foiled in their attack on Dresden, but having nobly stood their ground in a great battle with Bonaparte in person, on the 27th, began their retreat towards the Bohemian mountains on the 28th, and were followed on different roads by the French corps. Vandamme committed an error in descending the mountains of Culm, and attacking the allies in the valley. The allies, supporting his attack in front, moved two corps of troops upon his flanks—the one upon his right, and the other upon his left. Whilst these operations were making, General Kleist, who was in the rear, suddenly appeared upon the high road behind the position of Vandamme's corps, who now accordingly found himself surrounded. The result was the total annihilation of one complete corps of the French army, and, what very seldom occurs, the capture of the person of the general, and nearly his whole staff.

The third great success of the allies, that of General Blucher over Macdonald, was not less complete. General Blucher, as has before been related, moved towards the front of the enemy in Lusatia, whilst the main or grand allied force moved direct upon Dresden. General Blucher fought several minor affairs with good success, till he was attacked on the 21st by Bonaparte in person; and was compelled to retreat behind the Katzbach. Bonaparte having thus repelled him, returned in haste to Dresden, where he arrived on the night of the 22d, having left Macdonald in command of the French troops in front of General Blucher. Macdonald was on the banks of the Bober, which he ventured to cross. On the night of the 26th and 27th the river was swelled by a sudden inundation, and Macdonald found that his columns were separated from each other. General Blucher immediately perceived his advantage, and, availing himself of it, attacked and defeated the scattered columns with the greatest effect.

The fourth great victory of the allies was that of the crown-prince over Marshal Ney. This marshal was endeavouring to force his way to Berlin, and had nearly succeeded in breaking through the Prussian army interposed between Torgau and that city. Highly to the credit and glory of the Prussian army, of 40,000 men only, they withstood for a whole day the attack made upon them by Ney and Oudinot with a force nearly double.

Whilst affairs were in this situation, the crown-prince arrived with an army of nearly 70,000 men, and immediately fell upon the French advanced-corps. The result was the destruction of a third corps of the French army, the Swedes having taken 18,000 prisoners, and driven the enemy to Torgau and Wittenbergh.

Such, therefore, were the fruits of these victories, namely, the destruction of three corps, Vandamme's, Macdonald's, and Ney's, and the capture of nearly 45,000 prisoners.

During the gallant assault upon Dresden, General Moreau, while in earnest conversation with the Emperor of Russia on the operations, had both his legs carried off by a cannon-shot, the ball going through his horse. He died of the wound, September 2. The following was the emperor's letter to Madam Moreau, on this melancholy occasion:

"Madam,—When the dreadful misfortune which befel General Moreau, close at my side, deprived me of the talents and experience of that great man, I indulged the hope that, by care, we might still be able to preserve him to his family and to my friendship. Providence has ordered it otherwise. He died as he lived, in the full vigour of a strong and steady mind. There is but one remedy for the great miseries of life, that of seeing them participated. In Russia, Madam, you will find these sentiments every where; and if it suit you to fix your residence there, I will do all in my power to embellish the existence of a personage of whom I make it my sacred duty to be the consoler and the support. I intreat you, Madam, to rely upon it irrevocably, never to let me be in ignorance of any circumstance in which I can be of any use to you, and to write directly to me always. To prevent your wishes will be a pleasure to me. The friendship I vowed to your husband exists beyond the grave, and I have no other means of shewing it, at least in part, towards him, than by doing every thing in my power to ensure the welfare of his family. In these sad and cruel circumstances, accept, madam, these marks of friendship, and the assurance of all my sentiments,"

"ALEXANDER.

"Toplitz, 6th of Sept. 1813."

Twice did the Emperor Napoleon, with his guards and the corps of the Duke of Ragusa, make offensive movements upon the left of the army of Germany, and here was he compelled, by circumstances, to retire with precipitation and loss. Wittgenstein, with great bravery, defended his post at Dohna against the superior force of the enemy, and in retreating inflicted a greater loss on his adversary than what he himself sustained. On the 9th Bonaparte fought in person, and the allies only retreated that they might reach a more convenient scene to give battle. The French began their advance on the allies, and though the Prussian and Russian force in front of Toplitz was greatly out-numbered by the enemy, it was still determined, in the most gallant manner, to give them battle. Bonaparte did not deem it prudent to put his fortune on the cast, and he began his retreat, and endeavoured to advance into Bohemia, but he was disappointed by the determined spirit of the allies, and compelled to fall back into Dresden in the character of a fugitive. On the 13th, the advanced guards of General Blücher's army was at Bautzen, and continued its movement upon Dresden, pursuing the French troops as they retreated.

The Emperor Napoleon having united, on the 16th, a great part of the remains of the armies which had been opposed to General Blücher and the Crown-prince of Sweden, with the 1st, 2d, and 14th corps d'armée, had advanced at the head of his guards towards Nollendorf. He intended making a serious operation against Bohemia, and for this purpose, at noon, caused a column to file off at Nollendorf.

His serene highness, the commanding Prince of Schwartzberg, had given orders, that all the advanced posts should fall back into the position at Culm, and there await the enemy. The villages of Arbesau, Dalisch, Prenitz, and Johnsdorf, were relinquished to him. A lively cannonade commenced. The corps of the generals of artillery Counts Colloredo and Meerfeldt, defiled by the way of German Neudorf and Reinitz, on the left flank of the enemy, whilst Count Von Wittgenstein caused the Prussians, under General Von Zieten, to advance in masses of infantry on the enemy's front. The enemy shewed continually more masses of soldiers, and every thing for him depended on his gaining ground to débouch. The cavalry of the guards attacked the batteries of the allies with great resolution, whilst the French masses of infantry kept up a murderous fire on all sides.

At this important moment a squadron of Hesse Homburg hussars, supported by the brave Prussian cavalry, cut into the enemy's ranks. The Austrian infantry followed them with the utmost coolness. The enemy was every where forced back, and driven in the greatest disorder unto the heights of Nollendorf. The French general, Kreutzer, seven pieces of artillery, and a standard, fell into the hands of the allied army; the number of prisoners taken amounted to more than 2,000 men. A thick fog and the darkness of the night preserved the enemy's columns from unavoidable destruction. The Emperor Napoleon had a horse wounded under him.

General Walmoden, commanding a body of the allied troops on the lower Elbe, having been informed that Davoust had detached General Pechoux, with his corps, to the left bank of the Elbe, crossed that river on the 14th of September, near Domitz, and marched to meet him; on the 16th, he brought the enemy to action, whom he entirely defeated and dispersed, with a loss of from 1,500 to 2,000 in killed and wounded, and 1,500 prisoners, with eight pieces of artillery.

The allies now began to put in execution a grand plan of co-operation, which was to be decisive of the result of the campaign.

The Emperor Alexander having rendered the army of reserve under General Benningsen disposable for active service, that general marched from the Saxon frontier in Silesia into Bohemia, and arrived on the left bank of the Elbe, by Aussig and Leutmeritz, in the first days of October.

On the 7th, a report was received, that General Blücher, by the most rapid and brilliant movement that had been made during this war, marched from Elsterwerda to the mouth of the Black Elster, near the town of that name, and having crossed by the bridge he carried with him, defeated the French corps at Wartemberg, driving its remains to Wittenberg, and immediately advanced within reach of the prince-royal, who had bridges at Rossau and Acken.

On the 8th, accounts were received at Commotau, that the prince-royal had crossed the Elbe, and was in communication with Blücher. On that day, a general advance was made from all the posts on the Bohemian frontier, including General Benningsen's army.

It was now evident, that Bonaparte had left Dresden, and was concentrating his army at Leipsic, at Wurzen, and Eulenburg: the King of Saxony following with his family.

The Emperor of Russia left Commotau in the night of the 8th, followed by the reserve of his army.

The remainder of the grand army had proceeded down the Elster by Zeist and Pegau to Lutzen, on its left, and to Bornä and Espenheim on its right. General Blücher having moved to Halle, a direct communication was opened, through Merseberg, with that general and the prince-royal.

The enemy shewed a line of troops in the villages of Groben, Golsa, Stormenthal, and Kora, between the Pleiss and the Partha, which having been attacked by Count Wittgenstein and General Klenau, on the 13th, a considerable affair took place, in which the enemy was dislodged on his right, and it would have been more serious if the field-marshal, who came up, had not judged it premature, and put a stop to it.

During this period, a treaty of alliance and concert, between Austria and Bavaria, was signed, which opened new lines of communication to the south. By this treaty, which was concluded on the 8th, it was agreed, that the Bavarian troops, in conjunction with the Austrians, should co-operate for the attainment of a general peace.

Bonaparte had made a movement upon Wittenberg, and sent troops to destroy, or to oblige the allies to destroy, the bridges at Rosslau and Acken, pushing a small corps to Zerbst, by which he gave some ground to believe, that he meant to march down the right bank of the Mulda, to pass the Elbe at Wittenberg, and to repass again at Magdeburg. This feint had the effect of inducing the prince-royal to fall back to Cothen, where he assembled his army. Finding, however, that the movement of the enemy on the right bank of the Elbe had no other consequence, he decided to return to General Blücher, and to take his post in the general action with that general.

BOOK X.

CHAP. IX.

1813.

Reports having been received of the march of General Benningsen and Count Colloredo, the army marched on the 15th from Altenberg to Pegau, (the place of assembly on the morning of the battle of Lützen); and it was determined to attack the enemy the following morning. Accordingly the heads of all the columns advanced towards the enemy's position at day-break on the 16th; General Blücher by Schenditz to Golitz and Wetteritz; General Giulay by Lützen, on Lindenau; General Count Meerveldt between the Elster and Pleisse, on Connewitz; General Prince of Hesse Homburg, on the right bank of the Elster, in the same direction, to support Count Wittgenstein, towards Wachau; with General Kleist on his right, towards Liebert Wolkowitz; and General Klenau on the extreme right towards Fuchshayn on the Grimmel road.

The enemy occupied the only ridge in this plain in front of the named places, behind the centre of which, towards Leipsic, Bonaparte's tent was pitched. He was also in force at Connewitz, on the side of General Giulay's advance, and towards General Blücher.

At half-past nine, immediately on the emperor's arrival on the field, the cannonade began with Count Wittgenstein's corps, and immediately extended to both flanks on the whole position, and was continued without any intermission till after dark at night.

Count Wittgenstein almost immediately drove the enemy from the heights opposed to him, and the whole ridge was for some time occupied by the allies; but a large force of infantry and cavalry, opposed to General Kleist, occasioned a continual contest during the whole morning.

Count Meerveldt having advanced to Connewitz, beyond the right of the force opposed to Count Wittgenstein, repaired the bridge which had been destroyed on the Pleisse at Lolitz, and was about to pass over, when, unfortunately, his horse was killed, and himself taken prisoner by a column of the enemy, which was supposed to be a division of the allies retreating.

At the same time Murat, at the head of an immense body of cavalry, appeared on the ridge, on the right of Count Wittgenstein; and judging that he had time to attack before the Russian reserve could come up to him, he sent on the light artillery of the guard, and immediately afterwards charged with his masses of cavalry. The Russian reserve had broken ground in its front, which rendered it impossible for the cuirassiers to meet him with the velocity they desired; but the cavalry of Count Wittgenstein's corps attacked him in flank, and he retired with as much precipitation as he advanced.

During the preparation of Murat's attack, the Austrian cavalry was greatly distinguished; they made nine charges on the enemy's right, in some of which they swept the whole front with great slaughter. The Russian cuirassiers having advanced, together with the guards and grenadiers, and the latter having occupied a wood on their right, no further attack was made; but the cannonade and fire of the tirailleurs continued till after dark, when the troops lay upon their arms, upon the ground they occupied.

General Giulay, opposed by superior force, could not penetrate. General Blücher had a brilliant action, and defeated the force opposed to him, taking upwards of thirty pieces of cannon, an eagle, and more than 2,000 prisoners.

The next morning, at day-break, Count Wittgenstein's corps appeared on the ground from whence he had driven the enemy, but the heads of columns of the French cavalry and infantry were on their right on the same ridge, the cannon on each side almost within musket-shot, and the videttes within pistol-shot; and in this attitude the armies remained the whole day, without firing a shot, except some accidental skirmishing by the advanced men. Three great corps were advancing rapidly to join the allies; it was therefore evidently not to their advantage to renew the attack, unless either General Blücher, or the field-marshal, was attacked by the enemy, in which case either would have advanced immediately to support the other. Count Colloredo arrived at the village of Magdeborn at noon, and in the evening relieved Count Wittgenstein, who became his support. In the evening also part of General Benningsen's corps arrived, and would have immediately marched upon the enemy's flank, had not the general been made acquainted, while framing his attack, that the action was postponed. The prince-royal also sent notice, that he would arrive on General Blücher's left by the afternoon of the next day.

On the 18th, the disposition for a general action was carried into effect; Marshal Schwartzberg's order of battle, from left to right, was as follows:—Count Colloredo's corps, supported by the Austrian reserve, and connected with General Meerveldt's corps; Count Wittgenstein and General Kleist supported the Russian reserve; General Klenau, his right a little brought forward, supported also by Russian grenadiers; General Benningsen, his right still more advanced towards Posa; beyond the morass on his right, General Bubna, and Count Platoff were advanced, connecting between General Benningsen and the prince-royal.

General Blucher was to advance between his royal highness and the great morass which extends from Merseburg to Leipsic; and General Giulay in his original direction from Lutzen upon Lindenau.

The village of Liebert Wolkowitz was the point to which all the attacks, under the direction of the field-marshal, were to point; the corps advancing towards a central point, thereby becoming gradually more closely connected, and the more distant corps on the right advancing first.

The enemy occupied the villages with masses in their rear, but the more distant posts were carried without being much supported, the masses retiring with precipitation towards the suburbs of Leipsic. All the villages, however, were defended with cannon, which rendered the action and the cannonade general over the whole extent of the plain. Some of the villages nearest Leipsic were most obstinately disputed. The whole plain was covered with bodies of dead men and horses; and the ruins of the villages were full of heaps of dead and dying. Every part of the combination succeeded. General Blucher's left, connected with the prince-royal's advanced corps, consisting of the Russians and Prussians, came into action in the afternoon, having approached by Taucha. Towards the latter part of the day, by far the most serious and obstinate efforts of attack and defence were made at the villages of Stetteritz and Probsteyda, the former of which was taken and re-taken several times; the latter held out till dark. Napoleon was several hours between these villages, animating his men, and sending in fresh troops till dark; and it must be confessed, that they were most gallantly defended. A large body of Westphalian and Saxon troops, with 22 pieces of artillery, came over to the allies during the action.

The Emperor of Russia was with his army during the whole of the three days; on the first he was joined in the field by the king, who had remained at Toplitz, and had accompanied Gen. Benningsen's army in its actions near Pirna, and before Dresden.

In the afternoon of the 18th, the Emperor of Austria arrived, and joined the other monarchs near the village of Probsteyda, where their majesties remained till dark.

The enemy had then been driven from every part of his position, into a circle within cannon-shot of Leipsic, from whence a column had already begun its march towards the south-west. In the night, the villages of Stetteritz and Probsteyda were abandoned, and occupied by the allies; but Bonaparte continued to hold Leipsic, and the villages connected with the suburbs, with a strong rear-guard towards the allies.

Early on the 19th, the Emperor Alexander received a flag of truce, sent in the name of the King of Saxony, offering to capitulate to save the town. His imperial majesty gave his answer aloud, in the hearing of many hundred officers, with remarkable force and dignity: he said, in substance, that an army in pursuit of a flying enemy, and in the hour of victory, could not be stopped a moment by considerations for the town; that, therefore, the gates must be immediately opened, and, in that case, the most strict discipline should be observed; that if the German troops in the place chose to join their countrymen in this army, they should be received as brothers; but that he considered any proposal sent, while Napoleon was at hand, as extremely suspicious, as he well knew the enemy he had to deal with; that as to the King of Saxony personally, who had taken a line of determined hostility, he gave no answer, and declined making any communication.

The heavy cannon and columns of attack were ordered to advance. In the meanwhile, the prince-royal attacked and stormed the city on the other side, a Prussian corps being the first in the square.

General Toll, who had been sent with the Saxon flag of truce, to ensure the correct delivery of the message, was, at that moment, in the King of Saxony's apartment, and, running out, called to the Saxon guards to lay down their arms, which they instantly did; their example was followed by the Baden and Wurtemberg troops. The action continued some time in the further part of the town, and, before it ceased, the emperor and the king entered with the field-marshal, and met the prince-royal at the door of the King of Saxony's quarters. Gen. Blucher arrived also at the same time. All the cannon was taken.

Thus the allies gained a complete victory, and Bonaparte left Leipsic at nine in the morning of October 19, and retired with such precipitation and disorder, that Generals Regnier, Lauriston, Bertrand, and several others, were taken in Leipsic or near it. The intention of the enemy being apparent, the Russian reserve, and the troops which had been least engaged, marched at an early hour up the Elster, to endeavour to stop him; Cossacks having been already detached under the Hettman Count Platoff, to destroy bridges, and to occasion every possible difficulty and embarrassment. General Blucher had also detached a strong corps, to go up the left bank of the Saale.

BOOK X.

CHAP. IX.

1813.

FRENCH LOSS.

16th Oct.	Battle with Blucher	12,000
	Battle with the Austrians . .	15,000
18th Oct.	In the battle with the whole allied force, killed, wounded, and prisoners	60,000
19th Oct.	At Leipsic	30,000
	By desertion of Saxons, &c. .	25,000
Total loss of men		142,000

Thus, of 220,000 men, not more than 78,000 remained after the 19th, and these were dispersed and dispirited, and closely pursued. Of the allies an effective army of 200,000 men still remained.

Besides those great victories obtained by the allied armies, there were others of less importance, which tended to diminish the numbers of a powerful enemy. Lieutenant-general Von Bulow had defeated the French at Luckau: the battle lasted from ten o'clock in the morning till nine at night, and the enemy's loss was estimated at 2,500 men. The field of battle, with its suburb, was reduced to ashes. Several of these minor triumphs never came to the knowledge of the British ambassador, and were therefore omitted in Lord Cathcart's communications, to which, for the sake of fidelity, we have chiefly adhered.

CHAPTER X.

Series of Actions by the Army under the Marquis of Wellington.—Defeat of Soult.—Surrender of the Enemy's Post at Saragossa.—The British Commander's projected Invasion of France.—Battles of the Pyrenees.—Siege and Capture of the Town and Castle of St. Sebastian.—Motives for invading France.—Critical Situation of the French Empire.—Lord Wellington's Advance into France.—Capture of Pamplona.—The Enemy driven from Bastan.—Retreat of Bonaparte from Germany, and his Arrival in Paris.—Emancipation of Holland.—Series of Victories by Lord Wellington.

HITHERTO, for nearly two years, the war conducted by the Marquis of Wellington was necessarily termed the war in Portugal; and when the success of the British army and of its gallant commanders took the towns of Badajoz and Ciudad Rodrigo, and thereby transferred their direct operations to Spain, its name was changed to that of the war in the Peninsula. After the victory of Vittoria it became the war of the Pyrenees. In a few days, the British commander and his army had traversed the Peninsula from one frontier to the other; and his stages were marked by a succession of triumphs.

General Clauzel, with two or three divisions of the army of the north, not having been engaged in the battle of Vittoria, was occupied in the Asturias, and in the maritime parts of Biscay. After his intelligence of the battle, this French general, being thereby confounded in all his plans, was unwilling to abandon the Asturias to the Guerillas, though at the same time apprehensive that his march towards the routed armies would be intercepted. The Marquis of Wellington, for the purpose of relieving the Asturias, sent a detachment of considerable force towards Logrona, and another towards Tudela, where he must have passed. Notwithstanding these detachments had been most judiciously stationed, General Clauzel, partly by good fortune, and partly by an unexampled alacrity, effected his escape, and ultimately put himself in safety at Saragossa.

General Graham had hunted the enemy to the very foot of the mountains, and had crossed the small but deep mountain river, the Bidassoa, which separates France from Spain. The enemy, as if ashamed of the battle of Vittoria, and of their cowardly desertion of their own cause in that memorable contest, collected their spirits, and made efforts, in some degree, to recover their lost character. General Foy, an officer of known merit, having united the garrisons of Bilboa, Tolosa, and Mondragon, to his own division of the army of Portugal, opposed a good resistance to General Graham, and, upon the whole, fought with bravery and courage.

The Spanish army of reserve, under the Count d'Abisbal, marched in the rear of the allies, and was entrusted with the siege of the strong post of Pancorvo, on the high Burgos road. In the management of this affair they acted with the greatest gallantry, and at length accomplished the task assigned to them.

Lieut.-general Sir J. Murray, indeed, thought himself obliged to raise the siege of Tarragona, on the arrival of Marshal Suchet, which occasioned much disappointment, as this expedition had excited great interest. The naval and military forces performed their duty; they took the fort, and thereby, as they imagined, secured the rear of Sir John Murray.

Two practicable breaches having been effected at San Sebastian, July 24, orders were given that they should be attacked the next morning. The attempt to obtain possession of the place failed, with considerable loss on the side of the allied army.

Marshal Soult had been appointed Lieutenant de l'Empereur and commander-in-chief of the French armies in Spain and the southern provinces of France, by a decree imperial, on the 1st of July; and he joined and took the command of the army on the 13th; which having been joined, nearly about the same time, by the corps which had been in Spain under the command of Gen. Clauzel, and by other reinforcements, was called the army of Spain, and re-formed into nine divisions of infantry, forming the right, centre, and left, under the command of General Reille; Comte d'Erlon, and General Clauzel, as lieutenant-generals, and a reserve under General Villatte; and two divisions of dragoons and one of light cavalry, the two former under the command of Generals Treillard and Tilly, and the latter under the command of General Pierre Soult. There was besides allotted to the army a large proportion of artillery, and a considerable number of guns had already joined.

The allied army was posted in the passes of the mountains. Major-general Byng's brigade of British infantry, and General Murillo's division of Spanish infantry, were on the right, in the pass of Roncesvalles. Lieutenant-general Sir Lowry Cole was posted at Viscarret, to support those troops; and Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Picton, with the third division, at Glaque, in reserve.

Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill occupied the valley of Bastan, with the remainder of the second division, and the Portuguese division, under the Conde de Amarante, detaching General Campbell's Portuguese brigade to Los Alduides, within the French territory. The light and seventh divisions occupied the heights of Santa Barbara, and the town of Vera, and the Puerto de Echalar, and kept the communication with the valley of Bastan; and the sixth division was in reserve at San Estevan. General Longa's division kept the communication between the troops at Vera, and those under Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Graham, and Marischal del Campo Giron, on the great road. The Conde del Abisbal blockaded Pamplona.

On the 24th, Marshal Soult collected the right and left wings of his army, with one division of his centre, and two divisions of cavalry, at St. Jean de Pied de Port, and on the 25th attacked, with between 30 and 40,000 men, General Byng's post at Roncesvalles. Lieutenant-general Sir Lowry Cole moved up to his support with the fourth division, and these officers were enabled to maintain their post throughout the day. But the enemy turned it in the afternoon; and Lieutenant-general Sir Lowry Cole considered it to be necessary to withdraw in the night; and he marched to the neighbourhood of Zubiri. In the actions which took place on this day, the 20th regiment distinguished themselves.

Two divisions of the centre of the enemy's army attacked Sir Rowland Hill's position in the Puerto de Maya, at the head of the valley of Bastan, in the afternoon of the same day. The brunt of the action fell upon Major-general Pringle's and Major-general Walker's brigades in the second division, under the command of Lieutenant-general the honorable W. Stewart. These troops were at first obliged to give way; but having been supported by Major-general Barnes's brigade of the 7th division, they regained that part of their post, which was the key of the whole, and would have enabled them to re-assume it, if circumstances had permitted it; but Sir Rowland Hill having been apprized of the necessity that Sir Lowry Cole should retire, deemed it expedient to withdraw his troops likewise to Iruyita; and the enemy did not advance on the following day beyond the Puerto de Maya.

Notwithstanding the enemy's superiority of numbers, they acquired but little advantage over these brave troops during the seven hours they were engaged. All the regiments charged with the bayonet. The conduct of the 82d regiment, which moved up with Major-general Barnes's brigade, was truly gallant.

Lord Wellington was not apprized of these events till late in the night of the 25th and 26th; and he adopted immediate measures to concentrate the army to the right, still providing for the siege of San Sebastian, and for the blockade of Pamplona. This would have been effected early on the 27th, only that Lieutenant-general Sir Lowry Cole, and Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Picton concurred in thinking their post at Zubiri not tenable for the time during which it would have been necessary to wait in it. They, therefore, retired early on the 27th, and took up a position to cover the blockade of Pamplona, having the right, consisting of the third division, in front of Huarte, and extending to the hills beyond Olaz; and the left, consisting of the 4th division, Major-general Byng's, and Brigadier-general Campbell's Portuguese brigade, on the heights in front of Villalba, having their left at a chapel behind Sorausen, on the high road from Ostiz to Pamplona, and their right resting upon a height which defended the high road from Zubiri and Roncesvalles. General Murillo's division of Spanish infantry, and that part of the Conde del Abisbal's corps not engaged in the blockade, were in reserve. From the latter, the regiment of Travia, and that of El Principe, were detached to occupy part of the hill on the right of the fourth division, by which the road from Zubiri was defended.

BOOK X.

CHAP. X.

1813.

The British cavalry, under Lieutenant-general Sir Stapleton Cotton, were placed near Huarte on the right, being the only ground on which it was possible to use the cavalry.

The British commander-in-chief joined the third and fourth divisions just as they were taking up their ground on the 27th; and, shortly afterwards, the enemy formed their army on a mountain; the front of which extended from the high road to Ostiz, to the high road to Zubiri; and they placed one division on their left of that road, on a height, and in some villages in front of the third division. They had here also a large body of cavalry. In a short time after they had taken up their ground, the enemy attacked the hill, on the right of the fourth division, which was then occupied by one battalion of the 4th Portuguese regiment, and by the Spanish regiment of Pravia. The troops defended their ground, and drove the enemy from it with the bayonet. Seeing the importance of this hill to their position, Lord Wellington reinforced it with the 40th regiment; and this regiment, with the Spanish regiments of El Principe and Pravia, held it from this time, notwithstanding the repeated efforts of the enemy, during the 27th and 28th, to obtain possession of it.

Nearly at the same time that the enemy attacked this height on the 27th, they took possession of the village of Sorausen, on the road to Ostiz, by which they acquired the communication by that road, and they kept up a fire of musketry along the line till it was dark.

Having been joined on the morning of the 28th, by the sixth division of infantry, Lord Wellington directed that the heights should be occupied on the left of the valley of the Lanz; and that the sixth division should form across the valley in rear of the left of the fourth division, resting their right on Oricain, and their left upon the heights above-mentioned. The sixth division had scarcely taken their position when they were attacked by a very large force of the enemy, which had been assembled in the village of Sorausen. Their front was, however, so well defended by the fire of their own light troops from the heights on their left, and by the fire from the heights occupied by the fourth division and Brigadier-general Campbell's Portuguese brigade, that the enemy were soon driven back with immense loss, from a fire on their front, both flanks and rear.

In order to extricate their troops from the difficulty in which they found themselves in their situation in the valley of the Lanz, the enemy now attacked the height on which the left of the fourth division stood, which was occupied by the 7th caçadores, of which they obtained a momentary possession. They were attacked, however, again by the 7th caçadores, supported by Major-general Ross, at the head of his brigade of the fourth division, and were driven down with great loss.

The battle now became general along the whole front of the heights occupied by the fourth division, and in every part in favor of the allied army, excepting where one battalion of the 10th Portuguese regiment of Major-general Campbell's brigade was posted. This battalion having been overpowered, and having been obliged to give way immediately on the right of Major-general Ross's brigade, the enemy established themselves on their line, and Major-general Ross was obliged to withdraw from his post.

The British commander, however, ordered the 27th and 48th regiments to charge, first that body of the enemy which had first established themselves on the height, and next those on the left. Both attacks succeeded, and the enemy were driven down with immense loss; and the sixth division having moved forward at the same time to a situation in the valley, nearer to the left of the fourth, the attack upon this front ceased entirely, and was continued but faintly on other points of their line. In the course of this contest, the gallant fourth division, which had so frequently been distinguished in this army, surpassed their former good conduct. Every regiment charged with the bayonet; and the 40th, 7th, 20th, and 23d, four different times. Their officers set them the example, and Major-general Ross had two horses shot under him. The Portuguese troops likewise behaved admirably; as did also the Spanish regiments del Principe and Pravia.

Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill had been ordered to march by Lanz upon Lizasso, as soon as Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Picton and Sir Lowry Cole had moved from Zubiri; and Lieutenant-general the Earl of Dalhousie, from St. Estevan, to the same place, where both arrived on the 28th, and the seventh division came to Marcalain.

The enemy's force which had been in front of Sir Rowland Hill, followed his march, and arrived at Ostiz on the 29th. The enemy thus reinforced, and occupying a position in the mountains which appeared little liable to attack, and finding that they could make no impression on their front, determined to endeavour to turn their left by an attack on Sir Rowland Hill's corps. They reinforced, with one division, the troops which had been already opposed to him, still occupying the same points in the mountain, on which was formed their principal force, but they drew into their left the troops which occupied the heights opposite the third division, and they had, during the nights of the 29th and 30th, occupied in strength the crest of the mountain on the allies' left of the Lanz, opposite to the sixth and seventh divisions, thus connecting their right in their position with the divisions detached to attack Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill.

Lord Wellington, however, determined to attack their position, and ordered Lieutenant-general the Earl of Dalhousie to possess himself of the top of the mountain in his front, by which the enemy's right would be turned, and Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Picton to cross the heights on which the enemy's left had stood, and to turn their left by the road to Roncesvalles. All the arrangements were made to attack the front of the enemy's position, as soon as the effect of these movements on their flanks should begin to appear. Major-general the Hon. Edward Pakenham, who had been sent to take the command of the sixth division, (Major-general Pack having been wounded,) turned the village of Sorausen, as soon as the Earl of Dalhousie had driven the enemy from the mountain, by which that flank was defended; and the sixth division, and Major-general Byng's brigade, which had relieved the fourth division on the left of their position on the road to Ostiz, instantly attacked and carried that village. Lieutenant-general Sir Lowry Cole likewise attacked the front of the enemy's main position with the 7th caçadores, supported by the 11th Portuguese regiment, the 40th, and the battalion under Colonel Bingham, consisting of the queen's and 53d regiments. All these operations obliged the enemy to abandon a position which was one of the strongest and most difficult of access hitherto occupied. In their retreat, the enemy lost a great number of prisoners.

The attack made by Lieutenant-general the Earl of Dalhousie was admirably conducted by his lordship, and executed by Major-general Inglis and the troops composing his brigade; and that by Major-general the Hon. Edward Pakenham and Major-general Byng, and that by Lieutenant-general Sir Lowry Cole, and the movement made by Sir Thomas Picton, were highly commendable. The latter officer co-operated in the attack of the mountain by detaching troops to his left, in which the Hon. Lieutenant-colonel Trench was wounded.

While these operations were going on, Lord Wellington detached troops to the support of Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill. The enemy appeared in his front late in the morning, and immediately commenced an extended manoeuvre upon his left flank, which obliged him to withdraw from a height which he occupied behind the Lizasso to the next range. He there, however, maintained himself. The British commander pursued the enemy after their retreat from the mountain to Olague. They withdrew in the night, and took up a strong position, with two divisions, in the pass of Dona Maria. Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill, and the Earl of Dalhousie, attacked and carried the pass, notwithstanding the vigorous resistance of the enemy and the strength of their position.

The enemy was afterwards pursued in the valley of Bidassoa, and many prisoners and much baggage taken.

On the 30th, the enemy's fortified posts at Saragossa surrendered by capitulation to General Mina.

Before the defeat of Soult (called the battle of the Pyrenees), the Marquis of Wellington had, by an order of the day, intimated his purpose of entering the French territory. This order, which recommended a course of good and orderly conduct to the allied troops upon this occasion, displayed great wisdom and humanity, and proved that the illustrious general had all along entertained the purpose of invading France. He only waited the event of the siege of St. Sebastian.

The siege of St. Sebastian was interrupted by the operations of Marshal Soult, but was resumed as soon as supplies were obtained. The governor had a communication with Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Graham, the object of which was to commence a negotiation for the surrender of the place. Advantage was taken of this communication to send him a summons, but he demanded a suspension of hostilities for a fortnight; then to surrender, unless relieved, and to march his garrison into France, with arms and baggage, without being prisoners of war. These haughty conditions were rejected, and the fire, which had ceased for some hours, was recommenced the next evening. A breach having been effected in the walls, after a tremendous bombardment, the assault took place, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, on the 31st of August; and, by the heroic perseverance of all the troops employed, terminated in complete success. The number of prisoners taken by the allied army, during their assault and capture of the town of St. Sebastian, was 670.

The enemy was driven from all the complication of defences prepared in the streets, suffering a severe loss on their retreat to the castle, and leaving the whole town in possession of the allied army, whose loss, during this siege, was severe. A battery was constructed in the horn-work, with great difficulty, against the works of the castle, which opened on the morning of Sept. 8, and the garrison (whose loss amounted to two-thirds of their numbers), surrendered before evening. The troops in the castle amounted to 1,800.

In the capture of St. Sebastian, there are a few points which chiefly merit attention, and which it is the duty of an historian to notice with marked emphasis, as constituting the characteristic features of the gallant acquisition. The first of these was the gallantry of the first assault—"Not a man," said Sir Thomas Graham, "escaped with life, who attempted to ascend the ridge;" in other words, who first advanced to the breach in the walls, and who attempted to scale it. Now, as these troops (a forlorn hope!) advanced in a long thread of single files, they of course did not all reach the breach together; and by a necessary consequence, many of them must have seen their comrades fall successively by their sides. Under these circumstances (as they were all killed) they must have each advanced in his turn, and though they saw that their effort was attended with nearly certain death, they still persisted, and each fell in his turn. This is a singular proof of the determined character of this assault, and speaks volumes in itself.

BOOK X.

CHAP. X.

1818.

The second characteristic was the conduct of those distinguished officers by whom (as volunteers, or unnecessarily) the storm was led. It very seldom occurs that such a service as that of the assault of breaches is led by general officers; but here the second in command, under General Sir T. Graham, took the command in person of the storming column, was wounded most severely, and then suffered himself, with much reluctance, to be carried from the field. Sir R. Fletcher, moreover, the directing engineer of the siege, was killed in the trenches, or immediately upon leaving them, and Major-general Oswald wounded amongst the first. If the conduct of the forlorn hope be an unanswerable proof of the courageous determination of British privates, this pertinacious spirit of enterprise amongst British officers is an equally unanswerable proof that the officers were in no degree short of their men, but that all concurred with equal heroism to the successful accomplishment.

The third feature is the promptitude of General Graham, in venturing to direct his artillery to fire over the heads of his own men, and thus (with a most tremendous risk of hitting his own soldiers) to fire at an upper part of the wall, whilst his own men were scaling it at its foot. The mere mention of this circumstance is sufficiently explanatory of its peril and difficulty. The General seemed to have resorted to it with terror, and was surprised himself at its success. The artillery officers by whom this dexterous and successful fire was effected, deserved the highest commendation.

But the fourth, and the most honorable trait of all, was the merciful treatment of the conquered garrison and inhabitants: "not a man being put to the sword after the place was taken, and quarter being given to the soldiers."—This is more glorious than even the taking of the city.

If any thing can render war honorable to a civilized and christian community, it must be these two qualities, that it is justly commenced, and that it is humanely executed. The English army, as well and truly becomes them, have long set this merciful example.

The motives for invading France were at this time powerful: the situation of France was exceedingly critical—her armies were not only dispersed but considerably reduced—many of her generals killed or taken prisoners by the victorious Crown-prince of Sweden, the indefatigable Blücher, &c. Add to which, the French emperor was so closely pursued (as mentioned in our preceding chapter) that his return to Paris was very doubtful. Marquis Wellington therefore commenced his advance into France. The British army had its right at Zuganasnardi; from thence it extended by La Rhone, to the Montagne Verte, and from thence to the sea, holding what was considered by the French government the strongest line of the Pyrenees. His lordship having taken with him the first and fifth divisions crossed the Bidassoa at Irun, October 7, and leaving Fontarabia on his left, took the road, through Urogne and St. Jean de Luz, towards Bayonne. At Urogne he forced the French lines, but as the enemy had only 200 killed, and 500 taken prisoners, his force in this position was far from being strong: other divisions entered France by other roads.

On the 31st, the fortress of Pamplona surrendered by capitulation to Don Carlos D'España, the garrison being prisoners of war.

Since the beginning of August, the enemy occupied a position with their right upon the sea, in front of St. Jean de Luz, and on the left of the Neville, their centre on La Petite la Rhune in Sarre, and on the heights behind the village, and their left, consisting of two divisions of infantry, under the Comte D'Erlon, on the right of that river, on a strong height in rear of Anhone, and on the mountain of Mondarin, which protected the approach to that village; they had one division under General Foy at St. Jean Pied de Port, which was joined by one of the army of Arragon, under General Paris, at the time the left of the allied army crossed the Bidassoa; Foy's division joined those on the heights behind Anhone, when Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill moved into the valley of Bastan. In consequence of the heavy rains, the attack was deferred till October 10, when the allied army completely succeeded in carrying all the positions on the enemy's left and centre; in separating the former from the latter, and by these means turning the enemy's strong positions occupied by their right on the lower Nivelles, which they were obliged to evacuate during the night, having taken fifty pieces of cannon and 1,400 prisoners.

The enemy evacuated Ascaïn in the afternoon, of which village Lieutenant-general Don Manuel Freyre took possession, and quitted all their works and positions in front of St. Jean de Luz during the night, and retired upon Budart, destroying all the bridges on the lower Nivelle. Lieutenant-general the Honorable Sir John Hope followed them with the left of the army, as soon as he could cross the river; and Marshal Sir William Beresford moved the centre of the army as far as the state of the roads, after a violent fall of rain, would allow; and the enemy retired again, on the night of the 11th, into an entrenched camp in front of Bayonne.

Contrary to the general expectation, Bonaparte effected his escape from Germany. The French papers contained a bulletin, dated October 31, giving an account of his retreat from Erfurt to Frankfort, and claiming a victory over the united Bavarian and Austrian army, in the neighbourhood of the latter city. This army, commanded by General Wrede, had marched from Brannau, in order to cut off Bonaparte in his retreat from Leipsic to Frankfort, which object had been very nearly accomplished. On the 29th of October, the French were met at Gelnhausen by the advanced-guard of this army, about 5 or 6,000 strong, which was driven back on Hanau, where the main body had assembled. On the following day a battle took place in the neighbourhood, and the French pretended to have obtained a great victory with but little loss. The battle certainly terminated in their favor, as the enemy effected his escape; but the loss on both sides was nearly equal. On the 2d of November, Bonaparte entered Mayence, and the remains of his army crossed the Rhine. On the 10th Bonaparte arrived at St. Cloud, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

On Bonaparte's return, the Parisians were deceived by false statements and amused by vain pretensions. The year however closed with glorious achievements on the part of the patriots and the allies: viz. the emancipation of Holland, the storming and capture of the French lines before Bayonne, with fifty-one pieces of cannon, and a series of victories obtained by Lord Wellington over Marshal Soult.

Thus the edifices erected by Corsican ambition, and cemented with the blood of mankind, tottered on their bases and sunk prostrate to the ground! He who had carried invasion and desolation abroad, was now doomed to feel the effects of the former at home!

When the rising in Holland was determined upon, November 14, one of the leading patriots proceeded to the residence of Le Brun, the Duke of Placentia, the governor of Holland. He had the Orange cockade in his hat and on his breast, and he addressed Le Brun as follows:—"You may easily guess by these colours for what purpose I am come, and what events are about to take place. You, who are now the weakest, know that we are the strongest. We, who are now the strongest, know that you are the weakest. You will do wisely and prudently to take your departure with all possible speed, and the sooner you do it, the less you will expose yourself to insult, and possibly to danger." To this address Le Brun replied, "I have, sir, for some time, expected such a message, and I very willingly accede to your proposition, to take my departure immediately." "In that case," said the patriot, "I will see you into your coach without loss of time."

This was accordingly done. But by this time the people had assembled and surrounded the coach, with loud cries of "Orange Boven," up, Orange—down, Bonaparte. The patriot accompanied him in the coach out of the town, and no violence was offered him, except that he was obliged by the people to cry out, "Long live the Prince of Orange," and to wear the Orange cockade—too happy, no doubt, to get off so well. Having thus sent him off, the people laid hold of all the French douaniers and threw them into the river. All the watch-houses of the douaniers, and three of their vessels were burnt.

On the following day, the people of Amsterdam rose in a body, proclaiming the house of Orange, and universally putting up the Orange colours. This example was immediately followed by the other towns of the provinces of Holland and Utrecht, as Haarlem, Leyden, Utrecht, the Hague, Rotterdam, &c. At Utrecht, the garrison made some resistance, but the patriots fired upon them, and ten or twelve being killed on both sides, the garrison laid down their arms and were permitted to depart. The French authorities were dismissed, and a temporary government established and proclaimed, in the name of the Prince of Orange; and, until his serene highness's arrival, composed of the most respectable members of the old government, and chiefly of those not employed under the French.

The following account of the house of Orange is of such an interesting nature, that the reader will certainly pardon this digression.

William of Nassau, Prince of Orange, formed the famous union of Utrecht, in 1579, and was the first stadtholder. He married, 1st, Anne of Egmont—2d, Anne of Saxony—3d, Charlotte of Bourbon—4th, Louisa Coligni. He was succeeded, as the stadtholder, by Maurice, son of Anne of Saxony (after whom the Mauritii were named). He was again succeeded by Frederic Henry, the son of William the first and Louisa Coligni, and married Amelia, daughter of the Count of Solms. He was succeeded by William II. who married Mary, daughter of Charles I. King of England. William III. the next in succession, married Mary, daughter of James II.

BOOK X.

CHAP. X.

1813.

BOOK X.

CHAP. X.

1813.

King of England, and Ann Hyde. The next, William IV. was a great-grandson of a daughter of William II. and married Anne, daughter of George II. King of England. William V. (the stadtholder who sought refuge in England at the commencement of the French revolution,) married Frederica Sophia, Princess of Prussia. His son, the present Prince of Orange, and the sixth William, who was now hailed "sovereign of the Netherlands," under the title of William I. married the sister of the present King of Prussia and the Duchess of York; and his son, the hereditary prince, a gallant youth, distinguished himself under Lord Wellington.

When the intelligence of the emancipation of Holland arrived, the hereditary Prince of Orange returned to England from the army, in order to make arrangements for joining his father in Holland.

After the capture of the French lines before Bayonne, Nov. 12, when 2,000 were made prisoners, the British army went into winter-quarters. These were previously improved, however, by the capture of the town of St. Jean de Luz, notwithstanding some severe opposition on the part of the enemy.

The enemy having retreated from the Nivelle, occupied a position in front of Bayonne, which had been entrenched with great labour. The Marquis of Wellington had determined to pass the Nive immediately after the passage of the Nivelle, but was prevented by the bad state of the roads and the swelling of all the rivulets, occasioned by a great fall of rain. As soon as the weather permitted, and his lordship was enabled to collect his materials, and make the preparations for forming bridges, &c. he moved the troops out of their cantonments on the 8th of December, and ordered that the right of the army, under Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill, should pass on the 9th at and in the neighbourhood of Cambo, while Marshal Sir William Beresford should favor and support his operation by passing the sixth division, under Lieutenant-general Sir Henry Clinton, at Usteritz. Both these operations succeeded completely. The enemy were immediately driven from the right bank of the river, and retired by the great road of St. Jean Pied-de-Pont towards Bayonne. Those posted opposite Cambo were nearly intercepted by the sixth division; and one regiment was driven from the road, and obliged to march across the country.

The enemy assembled in considerable force on a range of heights, running parallel with the Adour, and still keeping Ville Franche by their right. The 8th Portuguese regiment, under Colonel Douglas, and the 9th caçadores, under Colonel Brown, of the British light infantry battalions of the 6th division, carried this village and the heights in the neighbourhood. The rain which had fallen the preceding night and on the morning of the 8th, had so destroyed the road that the day had nearly elapsed before the whole of Sir Rowland Hill's corps had come up, and Lord Wellington was therefore satisfied with the possession of the ground which he occupied.

On the same day, Lieutenant-general Sir John Hope, with the left of the army under his command, moved forward on the great road from St. Jean de Luz towards Bayonne, and reconnoitred the right of the entrenched camp under Bayonne, and the course of the Adour below the town, after driving in the enemy's posts from the neighbourhood of Biarritz and Anglet. The light division, under Major-general Alten, likewise moved forward from Bassusarry, and reconnoitred that part of the enemy's entrenchments. Sir John Hope and Major-general Alten retired in the evening to the ground they had before occupied.

On the morning of the 10th, Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill found that the enemy had retired from the position which they had occupied the day before on the heights, into the entrenched camp on the side of the Nive; and he therefore occupied the position intended for him, with his right towards the Adour, and his left at Ville Franche, and communicating with the centre of the army under Marshal Sir William Beresford, by a bridge laid over the Nive; and the troops under the marshal were again drawn to the left of the Nive.

On the same day, the enemy moved out of the entrenched camp their whole army, with the exception only of what occupied the works opposite to Sir Rowland Hill's position, drove in the picquets of the light division and Sir John Hope's corps, and made a most desperate attack upon the post of the former at the chateau and church of Arcangues, and upon the advanced posts of the latter, on the high road from Bayonne to St. Jean de Luz. Both attacks were repulsed in the most gallant style by the troops, and Sir John Hope's corps took about 500 prisoners. Thus the attempt made by the enemy upon their left, in order to oblige them to draw in their right, was completely defeated by a comparatively small part of their force. This favorable result was produced by the coolness, judgment, and ability of Sir John Hope, and of the general and staff officers under his command. Sir John Hope, however, received a severe contusion, which for a while deprived the army of the benefit of his assistance.

After the action was over, the regiments of Nassau and Frankfort, under the command of Colonel Kruse, came over to the posts of Major-general Ross's brigade, of the fourth division, which were formed for the support of the centre.

When the night closed, the enemy were still in large force in front of the allies' posts, on the ground from which they had driven the picquets. They retired, however, during the night, from Sir John Hope's front, leaving small posts, which were immediately driven in. They still occupied in force the ridge on which the picquets of the right division had stood; and it was obvious that the whole army was still in front of the left of the allied army; and about three o'clock in the afternoon, they drove in Lieutenant-general Sir John Hope's picquets, and attacked his posts. They were again repulsed with considerable loss.

The attack was re-commenced on the morning of the 12th, with the same want of success, the first division, under Major-general Howard, having relieved the fifth division.

The enemy having thus failed in all his attacks, with their whole force on the left of the allied army, withdrew into their entrenchments, on the night of the 12th, and passed a large force through Bayonne, with which, on the morning of the 13th, they made a most desperate attack upon Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill.

The Marquis of Wellington anticipating this attack, had requested Marshal Sir William Beresford to reinforce the lieutenant-general with the sixth division, which crossed the Nive at day-light on that morning, and his lordship further reinforced him by the fourth division, and two brigades of the third division. The expected arrival of the sixth division gave the lieutenant-general great facility in making his movements; but the troops under his own immediate command had defeated and repulsed the enemy with immense loss before their arrival.

Two guns and some prisoners were taken from the enemy, who being beaten at all points, and having suffered considerable loss, were obliged to retire upon their entrenchments.

The enemy marched a large body of cavalry across the Adour on the evening of the 13th, and on the morning of the 14th retired their force opposite to Sir Rowland Hill, towards Bayonne.

Marshal Soult made several movements on the right bank of the Adour, and towards the rear of Sir Rowland Hill's position; but all these movements were foreseen and frustrated. Thus foiled in every attempt to dislodge the allied forces from their positions, the main body of the French army retreated from Bayonne, and marched up the right bank of the Adour.

On the 18th, the right wing of the British forces occupied a position between the Adour and Nive, commanding the navigation of both those rivers, the centre to the left of the army were posted between the Nive and the sea.

CHAPTER XI.

Critical Situation of Bonaparte.—His Address to the Legislative Body respecting Peace.—Plan of Operations intended by the Allies.—Success of the Prince of Sweden's Operations against the Danes.—The Danish Force obtain a Suspension of Arms.—Declaration of the Allied Powers.—Addresses to the French Nation by the Allies.—Hostilities renewed with Denmark.—Treaties signed with his Majesty.—Bonaparte's Policy and Means of Defence.—He joins the Army.—Paris fortified.

IN order to raise twenty-seven millions of francs (about 1,200,000*l.* sterling) for carrying on the war, Napoleon was obliged to have recourse to the old revolutionary system of mandates. These mandates were to be sent to the prefects to pay the requisitions made for provisions, hay, horses, &c. for the army; and the price was to be, not the market price, but whatever the prefect was pleased to fix as the value. The buyer was to determine the price of the article; he was to pay for it in paper, which paper was to be assigned for liquidation upon taxes which might be utterly unproductive. Had Napoleon possessed any other means of procuring money, he would no doubt have used it in preference to this tyrannical and unpopular mode, as the same expedient must be repeated whenever his wants required it. All the ingenuity of the French government was employed in disguising the features of passing events. By degrees, however, the truth began to transpire, and as the public mind grew enlightened, the rulers of the press were compelled to admit some struggling facts into their papers, which, by the unconnected manner and apparent indifference in which they were introduced, tended to diminish in the opinion of the people the importance of the events themselves to which they related.

Unable to repel the allies from the banks of the Rhine by the force of arms, Napoleon had suddenly conjured up a general dysentery, which, he told his people, destroyed them by thousands, and weakened them so opportunely for the fortunes of France that they were struck with total incapacity to proceed. Though many believed, some doubted this report, and disaffection began to appear. In order to dissipate his people's apprehensions, he amused them with the hopes of peace, and indeed appeared at this time inclined to avert his danger by proposals to that effect. On the opening of the legislative assembly the French emperor made the following speech.

BOOK X.

CHAP. XI.

1813.

"Senators, counsellors of state, deputies from the departments of the legislative body—Splendid victories have raised the glory of the French arms during this campaign; defections without parallel have rendered these victories useless; all has turned against us.—France itself would be in danger, but for the union and energy of the French. In these weighty circumstances, it was my first thought to call you around me. My heart has need of the presence and of the affection of my subjects. I have never been seduced by prosperity. Adversity would always find me superior to its attacks. I have several times given peace to nations when they had lost every thing. From a part of my conquests I have raised thrones for kings who have forsaken me. I had conceived and executed great designs for the prosperity and the happiness of the world.—A monarch and a father, I feel that peace adds to the security of thrones and to that of families.

"Negotiations have been entered into with the allied powers. I have adhered to the preliminary basis which they have presented. I had then the hope, that before the opening of this session, the congress of Mannheim would be assembled; but new delays, which are not to be ascribed to France, have deferred this moment, which the wishes of the world eagerly call for. I have ordered to be laid before you all the original documents which are in the portefeuille of my department of foreign affairs. You will make yourselves acquainted with them by means of a committee. The speakers (orators) of my council will acquaint you with my will on this subject. On my side there is no obstacle to the re-establishment of peace. I know and partake all the sentiments of the French. I say of the French, because there is not one of them who would desire peace at the price of honor. It is with regret that I ask of this generous people new sacrifices; but they are commanded by its noblest and dearest interests.

"It was necessary to recruit my armies by numerous levies; nations cannot treat with security, except by displaying their whole strength; and an increase of taxes becomes indispensable. What my minister of the finances will propose to you, is conformable to the system of finance which I have established. We shall meet every demand without a loan, which consumes the future, and without paper money, which is the greatest enemy of social order. I am satisfied with the sentiments which my people of Italy have testified towards me on this occasion.—Denmark and Naples alone have remained faithful to their alliance with me. The republic of the United States of America continues with success its war with England. I have recognized the neutrality of the nineteen Swiss cantons.

"Senators, counsellors, deputies from the department to the legislative body—You are the natural organs of this throne; it is for you to give an example of energy which may recommend our generation to the generations to come. Let them not say of us, 'They have sacrificed the best interests of their country! They have acknowledged the laws which England has in vain sought during four centuries to impose on France.' My people cannot fear that the policy of their Emperor will ever betray the national glory. On my side I feel the confidence that the French will be constantly worthy themselves and of me!"

The following were the intended plans of the allies.

A corps under the Crown-prince were to penetrate into Holland, in a line from Cologne to the sea. Almost every Dutchman in the French service had deserted them.

Blucher, with another corps, was to cross the Rhine at Coblenz, and, opening a communication with the Crown-prince, was to march southerly.

The grand army under Schwartzemberg was to enter France through Switzerland, and advance in a north-westerly direction; indeed, the greater part of this army had already filed off in that direction.

An army of 70,000 men, under Bellegarde, was to carry on the war in Italy; but that could not last long, for various reasons: first of all, the Italians were extremely anxious for a change, in order to get rid of the conscription, which was particularly irksome to them. Murat himself was known to be very ill-disposed to Bonaparte, and there were neither troops nor money in the country to carry on the war. The Viceroy of Italy had only 30,000 men with him, who were so much exposed on their flank, by the junction of Bavaria with the allies, that they would not long be troublesome.

Brilliant success attended the Prince-royal of Sweden in his operations against the Danes. On the 4th of December all the corps of his army moved forward, and when they crossed the Stecknitz Marshal Davoust precipitately retired upon Hamburg, having quite exposed the right wing of the Danes which was posted at Oldesloe. He was pursued by General Woronzoff, who moved beyond Bergedorff and defeated the whole French cavalry in a sanguinary engagement at Wandsbeck. General Walmoden marched direct upon Oldeslohe, and Marshal Stedingk manœuvred on Lubeck, while General Tettenborn, with his light troops, pushed into the interior of Holstein by Trettau, and hung on the enemy's flanks and rear: from the first day General Tettenborn cut off all communication between the French and Danes, and took from the latter a considerable number of prisoners, carriages, and ammunition-waggons. He likewise intercepted some dispatches of the highest importance. Prince Frederick of Hesse did not hold out against these combined movements, but commenced a precipitate retreat on the Eyder. Lubeck was evacuated by the Danes, who were defeated at Bornhoft, on the 7th, by the Swedes, and vigorously pursued by General Walmoden; while General Tettenborn, with his troops, reached the Eyder before them; and at Husum and upon the roads of Flensburg and Schleswig took seven pieces of cannon. Thus, in less than six days the whole of the duchy of Holstein was conquered. The King of Denmark now repented of his obstinacy, and endeavoured to obtain a suspension of arms. An armistice at length took place, which, by desire of the king, was prolonged to January 6, 1814.

On the retreat of Bonaparte from the Elbe, a considerable number of French troops were left in Dresden, under the command of Marshal Gouvion St. Cyr. These troops, after the battle of Leipsie, were closely observed by the allies, in order to prevent their escape. Marshal St. Cyr, for a time, thought of nothing but resistance, and incessantly caused new entrenchments to be thrown up around the city, and the streets and suburbs to be barricaded. In the mean time, a dreadful famine prevailed in the city, which reduced the French and the inhabitants to the greatest distress. Finding it impossible to remain any longer in Dresden, the marshal attempted to march away with the greater part of his troops by the left bank of the Elbe, but the Russian commanders drove him back into Dresden. On the 6th of November, he attacked the blockading corps on the right bank of the Elbe, with the intention of penetrating to Torgau, but in this he was also foiled. Reduced to a state of despair, he now proposed a capitulation to General Klenau, on the condition of declaring his troops prisoners of war, but to be marched to France and there exchanged. This proposal was accepted; and the French began to quit Dresden on the 12th; but Prince Schwartzberg refused to ratify the treaty, and made the offer to St. Cyr of re-entering the place. This the marshal declined, and submitted to the condition of surrendering absolutely as prisoners of war. By a return, given as accurate, the number of troops thus capitulating, amounted to 1,739 officers, among whom were thirteen generals of division, beside the marshal; and 38,745 privates.

On the 21st of November, the fortress of Stettin surrendered to the allies by capitulation, on the same leading condition, that the garrison should be detained in Germany as prisoners of war. They marched out on the 5th of December, to the number of 7 generals, 533 officers, and 7,100 privates. Of these 1,400 were Dutch, who immediately mounted the orange cockade, that they might be sent to the assistance of their countrymen.

The following important declaration of the allied powers, expressive of the policy which they had in common agreed to adopt, for the attainment of a secure and honorable peace, was published at Frankfort, December 1.

"The French government has ordered a new levy of 300,000 conscripts. The motives of the senatus consultum to that effect contain an appeal to the allied powers. They, therefore, find themselves called upon to promulgate anew, in the face of the world, the views which guide them in the present war, the principles which form the basis of their conduct, their wishes, and their determinations.

"The allied powers do not make war upon France, but against that preponderance, haughtily announced,—against that preponderance which, to the misfortune of Europe, and of France, the Emperor Napoleon has too long exercised beyond the limits of his empire.

"Victory has conducted the allied armies to the banks of the Rhine. The first use which their imperial and royal majesties have made of victory, has been to offer peace to his majesty the Emperor of the French. An attitude strengthened by the accession of all the sovereigns and princes of Germany, has had no influence on the conditions of that peace. These conditions are founded on the independence of the French empire, as well as on the independence of the other states of Europe. The views of the powers are just in their object, generous and liberal in their application, giving security to all, honorable to each.

"The allied sovereigns desire that France may be great, powerful, and happy; because the French power, in a state of greatness and strength, is one of the foundations of the social edifice of Europe. They wish that France may be happy,—that French commerce may revive,—that the arts, those blessings of peace, may again flourish; because a great people can only be tranquil in proportion as it is happy. The powers confirm to the French empire an extent of territory which France under her kings never knew; because a valiant nation does not fall from its rank, by having in its turn experienced reverses in an obstinate and sanguinary contest, in which it has fought with its accustomed bravery.

BOOK X.

CHAP. XI.

1813.

BOOK X.

CHAP. XI.

1813.

"But the allied powers also wish to be free, tranquil, and happy themselves. They desire a state of peace which, by a wise partition of strength, by a just equilibrium, may henceforward preserve their people from the numberless calamities which have overwhelmed Europe for the last twenty years.

"The allied powers will not lay down their arms until they have attained this great and beneficial result, this noble object of their efforts. They will not lay down their arms until the political state of Europe be re-established anew,—until immovable principles have resumed their rights over vain pretensions,—until the sanctity of treaties shall have at last secured a real peace to Europe."

At the same time the Marquis of Wellington addressed the French people in the following manner.

"Upon entering your country, know that I have given the most positive orders (a translation of which is joined to this) to prevent those evils which are the ordinary consequences of the invasion, which you know is the result of that which your government made into Spain, and of the triumphs of the allied army under my command.

"You may be certain that I will carry these orders into execution, and I request of you to cause to be arrested and conveyed to my headquarters, all those who, contrary to these dispositions, do you any injury. But it is required you should remain in your houses, and take no part whatever in the operations of the war, of which your country is going to become the theatre.

(Signed) "WELLINGTON."

ORDERS.

"Although the country which is in front of the army be an hostile one, the general-in-chief anxiously desires that the inhabitants should be well treated, and properly respected, as has hitherto been the case.

"The officers and soldiers must remember, that their nations are at war with France, only because he who is at the head of the government of the French nation will not permit them to be at peace, and wishes to oblige them to submit to his yoke; they must not forget that the greatest evils which the enemy has suffered in his shameful invasion of Spain and Portugal, have proceeded from the disorders and cruelties which the soldiers, authorized and even encouraged by their chiefs, committed upon the unfortunate and peaceable inhabitants of the country.

"It would be inhuman and unworthy of the nations to which the general-in-chief alludes, to revenge that conduct upon the peaceable inhabitants of France, and this vengeance would, in every case, cause the army evils similar, or even greater, than the enemy has suffered in the peninsula, and would be very opposite to the public interests.

"The same regulations must therefore be observed in the cities and villages of France, as have hitherto been practised in the requisitions and receipts for provisions, which may be drawn from the country, and the commissaries belonging to each army of the different nations will receive from their respective general-in-chief orders relative to the mode of payment for the provisions, and the time within which the payment must be made."

A declaration of the allies was also transmitted to Switzerland, setting forth their determination "not to lay down their arms till they had ensured to the republic those places which France had torn from it; and, without any pretension to meddle with her interior relations, not to suffer Switzerland to be placed under foreign influence."

At the close of the year the French nation were thus addressed by the allies:—

"Frenchmen: victory has conducted the allied armies to your frontier. They are about to pass it.

"We do not make war upon France, but we repel from us the yoke which your government wished to impose upon our respective countries; which have the same right to independence and happiness as yours.

"Magistrates, landholders, cultivators, remain at your homes. The maintenance of public order, respect for private property, the most severe discipline shall characterize the progress and stay of the allied armies. They are not animated by the spirit of vengeance; they wish not to retaliate upon France the numberless calamities with which France, for the last twenty years, overwhelmed her neighbours and the most distant countries.

"Other principles and other views than those which led your armies among us, preside over the councils of the allied monarchs. Their glory will consist in having put the speediest period to the misfortunes of Europe. The only conquest which is the object of their ambition, is that of peace; but at the same time a peace which shall secure to their own people, to France, and to Europe, a state of real repose. We hoped to have found it before touching the soil of France. We come there in quest of it.

"The Marshal Prince SCHWARTZENBERG, Commanding in chief the grand allied army. "Head-quarters, at Lorrach, Dec. 31, 1813."

Field-marshal Blücher, on crossing the Rhine, issued the following proclamations:—

"To the army of Silesia,—When you advanced from the Oder to the Rhine, it was necessary to take from the enemy the provinces which he had previously occupied. Now you are going to pass the Rhine to force peace from the enemy, who cannot console himself for having lost, in two campaigns, the conquests which he had made during nineteen years.

"Soldiers—I have only to point out the road to glory to the conquerors of Katsbach, of Wurtenburgh, of Mockern, and of Leipsic, and I am certain of success; but I have new duties to prescribe to you. The inhabitants upon the left bank of the Rhine are not our enemies; I have promised them protection and security for their property. I have done so in your name. It belongs to you to perform what I have promised. Bravery does honor to the soldier, but subordination and an exact discipline are the highest titles to glory. "DE BLUCHER."

"To the inhabitants of the left bank of the Rhine,—I have conducted the army of Silesia beyond the Rhine, to establish the liberty and independence of nations, and to conquer peace.

"The Emperor Napoleon has incorporated with the French empire, Holland, a part of Germany and of Italy; he has declared that he would not give up a single village of his conquests, not even if the enemy were on the heights of Paris.

"The armies of all the European powers are acting against this declaration and these principles. Will you defend these principles? If so, range yourselves in the battalions of the Emperor Napoleon, and endeavour to fight against the most just of causes, which Providence so visibly protects. Do not partake in this opinion; you will find protection on our part.

"I will protect your property. Let every citizen, let every landholder, peaceably remain at home, and every magistrate at his post, to continue his functions without interruption.

"However, all connection with the French empire must cease, from the moment of the entrance of the allied troops.

"Whoever infringes this order will render himself guilty of treason against the allied powers; he will be carried before a military council, and condemned to death.

"DE BLUCHER."

The Danish government having rejected the basis proposed to it for a pacification, hostilities recommenced in the morning of Jan. 6, 1814. The blockade of Rensburg was formed, and the advanced posts of the garrison were compelled to retire under the cannon of the place.

The fortress of Gluckstadt capitulated on the 6th of January, and was occupied by the Swedish troops. The garrison, about 3,000, were prisoners of war.

An enemy's corps of more than 10,000 men, with from twenty-five to thirty pieces of cannon, made an attack on Breda. General Benkendorf, who defended the place, supported by a combined movement of Generals Bulow and Graham, forced the enemy to retire.

Early this year Lord Castlereagh (with his lady) sailed in the Erebus, with a favorable wind for Holland. His lordship, it was supposed, went as a negociator, in order to meet the other diplomatic characters; but he proceeded to the head quarters of the allies as a monitor.

Finding protestations useless, Bonaparte had recourse to acts to prove the sincerity of his wish for peace. Conscious that his iniquitous attempt upon Spain was one of his chief offences against the peace of Europe and the law of nations, he now endeavoured to make some reparation for the wrongs he had done that country, by releasing King Ferdinand VII. from his captivity, and allowing him to return to Spain with his brother Don Carlos, who had been kept with him at Valency. Previous to their departure, he bound them by a solemn oath, to conclude a separate treaty with him immediately after they should have resumed their stations, which was accordingly done.

The Emperor of Russia arrived at Lorrach on the 11th, and the reserves of the army having assembled in the course of that and the succeeding day, his imperial majesty and the King of Prussia crossed the Rhine on the 13th. The Emperor of Austria, who arrived at Basle on the evening of the 12th, went to meet their imperial and royal majesties at some distance, and they together entered Basle on horseback, at the head of the Russian and Prussian guards.

General Count Platoff, supported by the Prince-royal of Wurtemberg, sustained a gallant action between Epinal and Nancy, in which a considerable number of the enemy were killed and taken. General Wrede, in another action, put the enemy to a considerable loss.

On the 14th, treaties of peace were at length signed between the British and Swedish ministers, and the plenipotentiary of his majesty the King of Denmark.

Repeated bankruptcies evinced the distressed situation of France at this period. Bonaparte's embarrassments increased every day, which his dissimulation could no longer conceal. Considerable towns, such as Dole, Macon, Bourg, &c. opened their gates to small detachments of 200, and even of fifty men; and, in order to keep secret the true reason of the facility with which these places had been occupied, Napoleon laid the blame on their mayors, who failed to break down their bridges. Unable to disguise the fact of General Guilay's arrival at Langres, he said, that "in consequence of general arrangements, Marshal Mortier had quitted that town to take post at Chaumont." Compelled to acknowledge that the allies were within three leagues of Lyons, he added, with a striking felicity of invention, that "the inhabitants of that city had displayed much order and patriotism;" nevertheless, he owned that they had sent goods to the value of 100,000,000 of francs to the mountains; and as this might too clearly show that Lyons was totally unpro-vided with any means of defence, he assured his people that Marshal Augereau approached to its succour with troops of the line. This commander would therefore have been obliged to abandon Dauphine, the inhabitants of which, according to the Moniteur, had not displayed much ardor.

BOOK X.

CHAP. XI.

1814.

Whilst General Blucher's army rapidly advanced towards Metz, compelling Marshal Marmont to fall back, Napoleon contented himself with hinting that the Silesian troops were before Metz, Thionville, Mentz, and other fortresses; but spoke of their number with great contempt and indifference.

The last levies not having been completed in Brittany, Poitou, and Normandy, where the royalists had from the beginning waged war against the revolution, and where the people had probably been informed at this time of the approach of the Bourbon princes, it was necessary for Napoleon to conceal this fact from the southern departments; he, therefore, artfully caused to be published, that these provinces were sending large levies, which would form part of the reserve. He, whose sports were war and desolation, now became the slave and flatterer of his subjects; outdid them in his calls for peace, and bargained for their assistance in this emergency, on condition that he would never more call them to the field.

By a notice, published at Paris on the 13th, Bonaparte invited all such as had served in the imperial guards to re-enter that corps, until the enemy should be driven from the French territory.

The enemy finding all attempts at negotiation fruitless, began to assume a menacing tone. Great reinforcements were promised to the army under Macdonald. Victor had his head-quarters at Becaro; Marshal Ney's position was at Nancy; whilst General Duvignan occupied the defile before Epinal; General Duhesme was at St. Diez; General Segur commanded a brigade of the guards of honor, in the defile of Severne; General Montlegrier was at Rambervillers, and Marshal Marmont had taken a position on the Sarre. Segur exhorted the people to come forward en masse; assuring them, the present sacrifice they were called upon to make would be the last, and that the news alone of their rising en masse, would make the enemy retire from the country!!

By a decree, issued from the Thuilleries, the national guard of Paris was called out; and, in the French phrase, "placed in activity." Bonaparte himself was to command it in chief. His staff was to consist of one major-general, who was to be second in command; of four assistant major-generals, four adjutant-commandants, and eight assistant-captains. No person was allowed to find a substitute for the service of the national guard, except a father, by his son; a father-in-law, by his son-in-law; an uncle, by his nephew, and a brother, by his brother. Every arrondissement was to furnish a legion, consisting of 2,620 men; and as Paris was divided into numerous arrondissements, the force thus raised was estimated at about 40,000 men, being all the male population of the capital able to bear arms.

Bonaparte claimed a victory at Breda, on the 13th; and the Dutch papers, of the 21st, represented the French as completely defeated there. The Journal of France, however, acknowledged the death of the General of Brigade, Avy, and stated that General Maison had been deceived by false accounts. The emancipation of Genoa was also acknowledged in the following ludicrous manner—"General Jordy, who commanded in the place, had put it in a state of defence: he had fourteen pieces of cannon. The garrison consisted of 1,500 men; 1,800 men from Grenoble were coming to reinforce them, which was sufficient to secure it from a coup-de-main: by a sort of fatality, General Jordy was attacked by a fit of apoplexy on the morning of the day when the enemy appeared. The officer who commanded under him suffered himself to be prevailed upon by the citizens, and the garrison left the city. The prefect had forsaken it, so that for three days past the citizens had constituted themselves into a body, and had assumed the authority. The garrison had marched out, the citizens had opened the gates."

Provisions at this time in France were rising rapidly in price. The English prisoners at Verdun were removed in consequence of the advance of the allies. Bonaparte having collected an army of 70,000 men at Vitry, about 120 miles from Paris, was determined to make a desperate stand. The King of Denmark published a declaration, dated Middlefort, Jan. 17, in which he stated, to the great mortification of the French emperor, "that he would join the allied sovereigns, united against France, in order to assist in bringing about a general peace."

Previous to Bonaparte's leaving Paris, he, a second time, confided the regency, during his absence, to the Empress Maria Louisa; on which occasion she took the oath before him, in a council of the French princes, grand dignitaries, cabinet ministers, and ministers of state. On the 23d, the officers of the national guard of Paris, in number 800, were presented to Napoleon, in the Saloon of Marshals, on which occasion the following sublime and affecting scene (according to the Moniteur) took place: "when his majesty passed on his way to mass, he was saluted with an unanimous cry of vive l'empereur. On his return they were reiterated with new force. The officers, divided into legions, formed a vast circle, in the midst of which the emperor placed himself. Then appeared a scene the most affecting—the most sublime. The emperor, addressing himself to the officers of the national guard, told them that a part of the French territory was invaded, that he was going to place himself at the head of the army, and that he hoped, with the assistance of God and the valour of his troops, to repulse the enemy beyond the frontiers. At this moment his majesty's looks were tenderly fixed upon the empress, and the King of Rome, whom his august mother carried in her arms, and his majesty added, with a tremulous voice, that he confided his wife and his son to the love of his faithful city of Paris; that he gave it the highest mark of his esteem, in leaving under its protection the objects of his dearest affections; that he hoped his capital would not be polluted by the presence of the enemy; that, however, if, in the midst of the grand manœuvres which were preparing, some hordes of light troops dared to insult its barriers, he was sure that its brave inhabitants would not forget that their sovereign had confided its defence to them. At that instant a thousand voices resounded, a thousand arms were raised to swear to defend the precious trust confided to a faithful people!

On the 25th Bonaparte left his capital, and when the news of his departure became public, the French funds fell.

In the mean time, works of palisades and of defence were constructed with extreme rapidity at the different barriers of Paris. Port-holes were opened in some of these palisades for placing cannon in batteries in them. Some little barriers (called false barriers, as they served only for foot passengers) were constructed; at each of these, an ailet, eighteen inches wide, was made, so that only one person could pass at a time. The enclosure of Paris was stated to be a vast system of defence, on an extent of more than 13,000 toises. In the interior every hand was employed in the fabrication of arms. Forges were established under the halls of the public markets. Other vast edifices were provided with every thing proper to form military hospitals, it being intended that they should change for a time their destination. A call had been made on all citizens to furnish linen for bandages.

King Joseph Bonaparte remained in Paris, to review the several corps occasionally formed.

CHAPTER XII.

Bonaparte joins his Army.—State of Warfare in France.—Perilous Situation of the French Emperor.—Termination of Negotiations for Peace, and Dissolution of the French Legislative Body.—The Allied Troops form a connected Semicircle round Paris.—Bonaparte defeats General Alsuffieff.—Operations offensive and defensive.—Gallantry of Blucher.—The Allies withdrawn from the Banks of the Seine.—Conflict of Opinions.—New and interesting Change in the Positions of the French and Allied Armies.—Lord Wellington enters Bourdeaux, after a glorious Victory.—The Allies enter Paris.—Bonaparte's Abdication.—Restoration of Monarchy.

On the 26th of January, Napoleon arrived at Vitry, and entered St. Dizier on the 27th. On the same day he had attacked the rear of Marshal Blucher's army at St. Dizier; and forced it to retire upon the main body. He fancied that he had fallen in with the grand army, which he conceived would be compelled to retire before him. He soon learnt, however, that he had only engaged the force under General Blucher, who had then crossed the Marne, and was rapidly marching towards Troyes, to effect its junction with Prince Schwartzemberg, who moved still further to the south, on the Auxerre and Sens road to Paris. Instead of pursuing his advantage at St. Dizier, and in the direction of Lorraine, as he had first intimated was his intention, Napoleon resolved on preventing the union of the Silesian with the grand army, and for that purpose turned to his right instead of advancing, and unexpectedly fell on Blucher's main body at Brienne; although he brought all his force to bear on the Prussian veteran, the battle lasted, with alternate success, almost during the whole of the 29th; he, however, carried the castle in the evening, and Blucher, after a desperate but unavailing effort to retake it, set fire to the town, and retreated at the approach of night. Had not the grand army penetrated so far on his right towards Paris, Bonaparte would have followed up his success, and driven Blucher both upon Chaumont and Langres; but he felt that the capital might then be carried before the reserve, composed of new levies, could be formed for its protection. He therefore did not proceed farther than La Rothiere and Dienville, where he posted his rear under Victor and Grouchy, whilst he crossed the Aube with his rear, and hastily marched upon Troyes. This movement, however, was not unobserved, and the great numerical superiority of the allies enabled them to make a combined attack, on three points at once, to endeavour to frustrate his intention. The active Blücher traced back his steps, and on the 1st of February fell with his whole force on the rear-guard at La Rothière and Dienville. Meanwhile a corps detached from the army that invested Metz, Luxemburg, and Thionville, appeared before Vitry, on the road to Chalons; and an Austrian division, detached from the grand army, stormed the bridge of Rosnay, between Paris and the enemy, which Marmont was appointed to defend. On these points the enemy declared the assailants were repulsed with loss.

BOOK X.

CHAP. XII.

1814.

The battle of February 1 was fought on both sides with the greatest obstinacy and bravery. It lasted the whole of the day, and was protracted far in the night. Many villages were taken and retaken several times, notwithstanding the thickness of the snow which greatly impeded the movements, especially those of the artillery. Bonaparte headed some of the charges, and had a horse shot under him. His loss was differently rated in the various dispatches. He pretended that his rear-guard alone had been engaged, and had maintained itself all the day against five times its number. At the close of the action with General Blücher, a battery of artillery moving to support a cavalry manoeuvre missed its way in the obscurity of the night, and was taken. As soon as they perceived this ambush, they cut the traces, mounted the horses, and contrived to escape with some loss. Their situation however was not much improved by their escape. Though they retained courage enough to remain during the night so close to the enemy, that the advanced posts were almost intermixed, and Berthier nearly went over to the allies whilst making his rounds, yet no sooner had the morning dawned than they retreated; taking positions, or rather being drawn from thence, until they effected their passage across the Aube, and regained Napoleon's main body, which on the 3d established itself at Troyes. In the battle of Brienne, the loss of the French was very considerable in killed and wounded; that of the allies was also considerable. The latter, however, took seventy-three pieces of cannon and 4,000 prisoners.

During the negotiations for peace, terms were proposed and seemingly accepted, which were of such a nature as to reduce the power of Bonaparte below that of France under her kings. The legislative assembly of France, hitherto the organs of Bonaparte's will, for what he said they echoed, and what he commanded they complied with, became less obedient when adversity had overtaken him, and ventured, in a report drawn up by an extraordinary committee; to recommend peace in the strongest manner. The report was ordered to be printed, but in the night the police entered the printing-office, destroyed the copies already printed, and broke the forms to pieces. Immediately after, the assembly was dissolved.

On the 8th of February, the allied troops formed round Paris a connected semicircle, on a cord of which stood Bonaparte, with all the troops he could gather from every part of the dominions still in his power, like the bear at a stake, ready to take advantage of the unguarded and unsupported advance of the boldest assailants. The 9th was spent on both sides in military movements.

On the 10th, by Bonaparte's own bulletin, the Silesian army was acknowledged to be within three days march of Paris; and it became necessary for him to relieve the capital from immediate pressure on that side; accordingly, on that day, Bonaparte, who had previously made all the necessary preparations for that object, moved forward from Sezanne, to attack the van-guard of General Sacken, posted at Champaubert, under General Alsuffieff. He succeeded in completely surprising that corps, which was obliged to yield to superior force, with considerable loss in artillery and men, killed, wounded, and prisoners; and among the last was the commanding general himself.

Napoleon executed his plan of interposing between Prince Schwartzemberg's and Blücher's armies: he stood in the rear of the former, and in front of the latter, and though between two fires, and threatened with utter annihilation in case of defeat, he had the merit of preventing at this time the farther march of either of the allied commanders on Paris.

Generals Sacken and D'York, eager to revenge the defeat of Alsuffieff, advanced the next day (Feb. 11) to Montmirail, about twelve miles from Champaubert, to attack the enemy. They met Bonaparte at the head of 30,000 men: a desperate action ensued; the village of Marchais was taken and retaken three times. Those corps of the allies boasted of having retained their position, but admitted the loss of four pieces of cannon. As they subsequently retreated towards the Marne, and afterwards retired behind that river, on the 13th, it is evident the enemy had the advantage; but it was by no means so great as the French bulletins stated; for, according to them, Bonaparte made thousands prisoners, while all the rest were killed or drowned in a fish-pond!

General Blücher, who had been apprised that Sacken and D'York had been worsted by the enemy, but who was not aware of their having retreated across the Marne, advanced on the 13th from Bergeres, the centre of his position, to support them. He directed his march towards Etoges, a small town occupied by Marshal Marmont, with 9 or 10,000 men, to observe his movements, and who retreated on his approach. Marshal Blücher, though not able to make any serious impression on him, harassed him, in his retreat and followed him to the small village of Fromentieres, and both armies bivouacked for the night, Blücher being determined to attack the next day. But before this design could be carried into execution, Marmont retreated still farther to Janvillieres. In the mean time, Bonaparte (who, having followed General Sacken to the Marne, was at Chateau Thierry on the 13th) made a forced march in the night with all his guards, and a considerable corps of cavalry; and on the morning of the 14th effected his preconcerted junction with Marmont.

The veteran Blücher was greatly surprised by this rapid and masterly movement. An engagement was now inevitable; he had to contend in a flat country, with forces superior to his in a double proportion, and with a cavalry three-fold more numerous; he was, however, superior in artillery. In this unforeseen exigency, Blücher was still himself, and he could rely on his troops. The cavalry of his advanced-guard was soon forced to give way before the vastly superior numbers of the enemy; but it found a safe retreat in the intervals of the infantry, formed into squares, behind which it rallied. Blücher, however, finding the ground untenable, from the superiority of forces against him in an open country, began his retreat towards Etoges. His infantry continued formed in solid squares, the intervals being furnished with artillery, and the cavalry occasionally skirmishing on the exterior side of his moving fortresses. In this way he retreated near sixteen miles, fighting every inch of the ground, resisting the most furious charges of the enemy's cavalry, without one of his squares being once broken. Surrounded at one time, on all sides, he broke his way by his determined resolution, the steadiness of his troops, and the fire of his artillery and musketry, first through circumvening corps of cavalry, and at last reached Etoges at night, in safety, with the loss of about 3,500 men, while that of the enemy was far more considerable. Had one of his squares been broken, the loss of Blücher's army was inevitable. Bonaparte firmly reckoned upon it; therefore Blücher and his army acquired by this retreat more glory than by the most splendid victory.

Blücher, in consequence of this action, retreated unmolested to Chalons, behind the Marne, where he was afterwards joined by the corps separated from his army during these operations, and by others who hastened to reinforce him. Having been completely refitted with all necessaries, Blücher's army began its march from Chalons, to join Prince Schwarzenberg.

When Bonaparte moved to attack Blücher, the Austrians advanced forward from Troyes. From the 9th to the 16th of February, they were successful. Sens and Fontainebleau were taken by storm, and the advanced posts on that side pushed very near Paris: the grand army was established on the Seine, in possession of the bridge, and with the corps of Generals Wrede, Wittgenstein, and Bianchi, on the Paris side of that river, pressing on that capital. On the 15th, however, Bonaparte recalled by those movements from the pursuit of Blücher, attacked the van-guard of Wittgenstein, and defeated it with considerable loss in men and artillery. Next day, after several fruitless attempts, he succeeded by a last attack in forcing the town and bridge of Montereau, where the Prince-royal of Wurtemberg was posted, and a considerable part of his army immediately passed the Seine. Schwarzenberg, who had been deceived by false intelligence from one of his generals, commenced his retreat towards Troyes, and thus the banks of the Seine, like those of the Marne, were evacuated by the allies.

Bonaparte, notwithstanding, evinced great dissatisfaction in the very bulletin in which he announced those advantages. He blamed three of his generals, among whom was Marshal Victor; Montbrun, another of them, was sent to trial. In the eulogium pronounced on General Chateau, killed before Montreaux, an indirect censure was cast on the lukewarmness of all his officers in general.

At this time, a conflict of political opinions prevailed; some entertaining sanguine hopes of a peace, and others of Bonaparte's downfall. The object of the allies was to enter Paris, and then make a full disclosure of their views. Austria adopted this measure with some reluctance. Before the battles of the 17th and 18th of February, Bonaparte transmitted a project of a treaty upon the bases of the ancient limits, and the retreat of the grand Austrian army to Troyes, after the partial disasters experienced by the Russians, Bavarians, and Wurtembergers at Nangis and Montereau, were supposed to have taken place on account of Napoleon's proposals, backed by his victories. The Emperor of Austria, who did not entirely approve of the attempt on Paris, finding that the other armies had failed, and that all the weight of the enterprise fell on his own, after their defeats, ordered his troops to fall back, although only one of their corps (Bianchi's) had been partially engaged, and they still possessed a great superiority of numbers, which must have ensured success, had they resolutely pushed on to the French capital. This retrograde movement, and the explanation of the reasons on which it was founded, as well as the renewed pacific views of Austria, created some difficulties amongst the allies, and occasioned important communications to the Prince-regent of Great Britain.

A new and interesting change, however, took place in the respective positions of the French and the allies in France. The latter had been driven from the neighbourhood of Paris, on the north-east and south-east quarter. Prince Schwartzberg abandoned the banks of the Seine, and even the line of the Aube, to retreat towards the Marne. Blucher had also evacuated all the country between Paris and the last-named river, and was apparently using his utmost endeavours to effect a junction with Schwartzberg; for which purpose he had passed the Aube, at Arcis-sur-Aube, on his way to Troyes, where he intended to join the grand army. He was attacked by Bonaparte at Mery-sur-Seine, Feb. 21. The town in the conflict was set on fire, and Bonaparte boasted of only 100 being made prisoners. Arrangements had been made for burning the bridge over the Seine, that divides the town in two parts. The wind blew violently, and the town, which was on fire in three places, could not be saved. Whilst Field-marshal Blucher was reconnoitering the enemy's position in the town, he was struck with a musket-ball in the leg, which did him no material injury.

BOOK X.
CHAP. XII.
1814.

The next day, Bonaparte was seen marching a considerable quantity of infantry, cavalry, artillery, and baggage, towards Troyes. Blucher then thought that his object had been effected: by a forced march during the night, he retraced his steps, threw bridges over the Aube, and pushing again forward towards the north, drove Marshal Marmont from position to position, and at last crossed the Marne near Meaux (only twenty-five miles from Paris) on the 27th, and was on the 28th firmly established on both banks of the river. He was aware, at the same time, that Bonaparte might have troops in his rear; but for this he had provided. Bonaparte, however, soon discovered the feint which had been practised upon him; and leaving Oudinot with 45,000 men, to observe Schwartzberg's army, set out himself with his principal force, in pursuit of Blucher. The veteran general having fully anticipated these movements, retreated at the approach of Bonaparte, towards the north, where he was sure of meeting reinforcements from the army of the crown-prince, and of uniting with the crown-prince himself. Bonaparte suffered himself to be drawn away from the central position he had so judiciously chosen in the beginning, by this march of Blucher; and after a useless and fatiguing pursuit, he was forced to acknowledge, in a short sulky bulletin of the 5th of March, that he had obtained no advantages; but that Blucher's army, with the numerous corps by which it had been joined, would have been destroyed but for the treason of the Commandant of Soissons, who opened its gates to the allies. Rheims, however, was liberated, (as he termed it) though this town was a few days before sharply reprimanded in the Moniteur, for the friendly reception the allied troops had experienced from the inhabitants;

consequently, they could not have considered the arrival of Bonaparte's troops as a deliverance.

In the mean time Prince Schwartzberg, fully aware of Marshal Blucher's movements, and acting on the same plan of manœuvres adopted near Dresden, advanced again on his side towards Paris, which he knew Bonaparte was too far north to protect. He marched again upon Troyes, and upon all the neighbouring positions. The French were every where defeated, with even more confusion than loss, in several partial actions. They retreated to Troyes in a distracted state, and obtained a capitulation, by which they were allowed only half an hour to evacuate the place. At the expiration of that time, the cavalry of the allies was sent in pursuit of the fugitives, and a great number of prisoners were brought in, as might be naturally expected, from the previous state of disorganization of those troops. On the 4th of March, Prince Schwartzberg's head-quarters were at Troyes. Thus Bonaparte had no other course left him but to retrace his steps back again to the south, with an army exhausted by fatiguing marches, and considerably diminished by losses.

A still brighter prospect was open, by the spirit which the French people manifested at the sight of the first of the Bourbon princes who had appeared among them since the revolution. Count d'Escars, who accompanied Monsieur, the French king's next brother to France, declared in a letter, that all ranks of the people approached them with acclamations of "Vive le Roi Louis XVIII. et les Bourbons." On the first day of their entering France they travelled thirty-three leagues. Monsieur had an army of 8,000 men, of whom a part were cavalry.

Marshal Blucher effected his junction with Winzingerode and Bulow, March 3, and an action took place at Craone on the 7th, on which occasion the allies sustained some partial losses, and were obliged to continue their retrograde march from the Marne to Laon.

On the 9th of March, Bonaparte's right wing was defeated, with considerable loss, by the army of Silesia, under its veteran chief, who took forty-five pieces of cannon, and a great number of prisoners. Bonaparte kept his ground before Laon on the 10th, with his left wing and centre, and continued the attack, during the whole of that day, with such obstinacy that a wood and village were taken and retaken five different times. Night alone put an end to the engagement, and the enemy availed himself of it to retreat.

These important occurrences removed every prospect of an immediate peace. War, blazed with renewed fierceness; and the tide of success having turned towards the allies, they were determined to oblige France to accept of their own terms. The preliminaries of peace had been drawn, and intelligence of their being signed was momentarily expected, when suddenly Lord Wellington, having forced the passage of the Adour, was rapidly advancing towards Bourdeaux. The British hero returned to Garris on the 21st of February, and ordered the sixth and light divisions to break up from the blockade of Bayonne, and General Don Manuel Freyre to close up the cantonments of his corps towards Irun, and to be prepared to move when the left of the army should cross the Adour. On the 24th Lieutenant-general Sir Rowland Hill passed the Gave d'Oleron at Villeneuve with the light, second, and Portuguese divisions, under the command of Major-general Charles Baron Alten, Lieutenant-general Sir W. Stewart, and Marshal de Campo Don F. Le Cor, while Lieutenant-general Sir H. Clinton passed with the sixth division between Montford and Laas, and Lieutenant-general Sir T. Picton made demonstrations, with the third division, of an intention to attack the enemy's position at the bridge of Sanveterre, which induced Soult to give orders to blow it up. Field-marshal Sir W. Beresford attacked the enemy on the 23d in their fortified posts at Hastings and Oyergave, on the left of the Gave de Pau, and obliged them to retire within the tête-du-pont at Peyrehourade.

Immediately after the passage of the Gave d'Oleron was effected, Sir Rowland Hill and Sir Henry Clinton moved towards Orthies and the great road leading from Sanveterre to that town. The enemy retired at night from Sanveterre across the Gave de Pau, and reassembled their army near Orthies on the 25th, having destroyed all the bridges on the river. The allied army crossed the Gave de Pau below the junction of the Gave d'Oleron on the morning of the 26th, and early on the 27th found the enemy in a strong position near Orthies, with his right on the heights on the road to Dax, and occupying the village of St. Boes, and his left on the heights above Orthies and that town, and opposing the passage of the river by Sir Rowland Hill. The course of the heights on which the enemy placed his army, necessarily retired his centre, while the strength of the position gave extraordinary advantage to the flanks. Marshal Sir W. Beresford was ordered to attack the enemy's right with the fourth division, under Lieutenant-general Sir Lowry Cole, and the seventh division, under Major-general Walker, and Colonel Vivian's brigade of cavalry, while Sir Thomas Picton was to march along the great road leading from Peyrehourade to Orthies, and attack the heights on which the enemy's centre and left stood with the third and sixth divisions, supported by Sir S. Cotton with Lord E. Somerset's brigade of cavalry. Major-general C. Baron Alten, with the light division, kept up the communication, and was in reserve between these two attacks. Sir Rowland Hill was likewise ordered to cross the Gave, and to turn and attack the enemy's left. Sir William Beresford carried the village of St. Boes after an obstinate resistance by the enemy; but the ground was so narrow that the troops could not decide to attack the heights, notwithstanding the repeated attempts of Major-general Ross and Brigadier-general Vasconcello's Portuguese brigade; and it was impossible to turn the enemy by their right, without an excessive extension of their line. Lord Wellington, therefore, so far altered the plan of the action as to order the immediate advance of the third and sixth divisions, and he moved forward Colonel Barnard's brigade of the light division to attack the left of the height on which the enemy's right stood.

The attack, led by the 52d regiment, under Lieutenant-colonel Colborne, and supported on their right by Major-general Brisbane's and Colonel Kean's brigades of the third division, and by the simultaneous attacks on the left by Major-general Anson's brigade of the fourth division, and on the right by Lieutenant-general Sir T. Picton, with the remainder of the third division, and the sixth division under Sir Henry Clinton, dislodged the enemy from the heights and procured the victory. In the meantime Sir R. Hill had forced the passage of the Gave above Orthies, and seeing the state of the action, moved immediately with the second division of infantry, under Lieutenant-general Sir W. Stewart, and Major-general Fane's brigade of cavalry, direct for the great road from Orthies to St. Sever, thus keeping upon the enemy's left. The enemy retired at first in admirable order, taking every advantage of the numerous good positions which the country afforded. The losses, however, which they sustained in their continued attacks, and the danger with which they were threatened by Sir R. Hill's movements, soon accelerated their movements, and the retreat at length became a flight, their troops being in the utmost confusion.

Lieutenant-general S. Cotton took advantage of the only opportunity which offered to charge with Major-general Lord E. Somerset's brigade, in the neighbourhood of Sault de Navailles, where the enemy had been driven from the high road by Lieutenant-general Sir R. Hill. The 7th hussars distinguished themselves upon this occasion, and made many prisoners. Lord Wellington having continued the pursuit till it was dusk, halted his army in the neighbourhood of Sault de Navailles. Six pieces of cannon were taken from the enemy, and a great many were made prisoners. The whole country was covered with the enemy's dead: his army was in the utmost confusion when passing the heights near Sault de Navailles, and several of his soldiers had thrown away their arms. The desertion afterwards became immense. The British commander-in-chief followed the enemy the day after to St. Sever, and on the 1st of 1814.

BOOK X.

CHAP. XII.

BOOK X

CHAP. XII.

1814.

March passed the Adour, the enemy having left open the direct road to Bourdeaux.

After the 1st of March the rains set in again, and all the streams became no longer fordable. Sir John Hope had crossed the Adour, below Bayonne, Feb. 23, and as soon as he had gained possession of the heights of the Adour, a garrison detachment of 2,000 men were drawn out to meet him, whom he threw into complete confusion. The flotilla met with the severest difficulties in crossing the Adour, where there is always a surf, but at length the bridge was established, and they all passed, to the astonishment of the inhabitants, who flocked to see what they could not otherwise believe. Such was the situation of Soult, that he preferred to leave the road to Bourdeaux open, and a detachment under Sir W. Beresford was sent to take possession of that city; its occupation being of the utmost military importance.

No sooner had the British standard cast its protecting shadow on the banks of the Garonne, than the whole population of Bourdeaux, headed by its mayor, advanced to meet the warriors. The imperial eagles were laid prostrate, and the royal lilies were exalted: the white cockade resumed its place, the airs of ancient loyalty hailed the descendant of a martyred king, and the name of BOURBON was proclaimed with the enthusiasm of liberated patriots! This event, so unexpected after the instance of indifference and subserviency which France had hitherto displayed, rekindled hope and animation on the British shores. Peace, always contemplated with dread, notwithstanding the favorable nature of its conditions, as long as it was to be made with Bonaparte, immediately saw the number of its supporters diminish. Thanks to the Marquis of Wellington, and the army under his command, were immediately and unanimously voted in both houses of the imperial parliament, for that consummate ability which obtained the victory of Orthies.

The capture of Rheims, on the 13th of March, by Napoleon in person, was preceded by a well-fought battle, in which the allies acknowledged a loss of 2,000 killed and wounded, and eight pieces of cannon.

Prince Schwartzemberg having heard of Blücher's successes at Laon, was determined to act on the offensive, and for that purpose moved his head-quarters to Pont-sur-Seine. Intelligence of the defeat of Count St. Priest, at Rheims, having reached him, he changed his plans, and fell back to Arcis, intending to march on Chalons, in order to support the Prussian veteran: but, on the 16th, he learnt that the enemy occupied Chalons and Epernay, where Bonaparte arrived on the 17th.

On the 18th, Marshal Blücher drove the enemy over the Aisne, and advanced to Rheims, the enemy having retreated at his approach. On the 19th, Bulow marched upon Soissons, and on the same day Winzingerode proceeded towards Rheims. On the 20th, Blücher intercepted a letter addressed to Bonaparte, giving him an account of the entrance of the English army into Bourdeaux, and of the general rising of the people in favor of the Bourbons.

General Bianchi obtained a victory over Augereau at Maçon, having taken 500 prisoners and two pieces of cannon. All the French posts in the Simphon were taken.

On the 21st, the enemy occupied Arcis, while the allies collected their troops before that place, without any opposition except an endeavour to cut off the division of the Prince-royal of Wurtemberg, which terminated in the loss of three pieces of cannon on the part of the enemy. The two armies then remained in presence of each other. At length the allies perceived that the French army was defiling on the road to Vitry. Only a strong rear-guard was left at Arcis, and they lost no time in attacking it with their whole force. After an obstinate resistance, it was driven out of the town with considerable loss, and followed the main army on the Vitry road.

Soult, after several actions, in which his rear-guard had suffered considerable loss, had retreated beyond Tarbes.

The negotiations which had been held at Chaillon were broken off, March 18. From the first moment the allies crossed the Rhine, they offered peace to Napoleon, who, they thought, would never be moderate enough to accept any terms proposed. Bonaparte, however, attempted to out-wit them, and unexpectedly closed with their proposals, intending to gain time by negotiations until he should have assembled a sufficient force to renew the war with a greater prospect of success. The continuation of hostilities partly defeated his intentions, but as they were never pushed to an extremity, on account of the pending congress, he still found means to assemble such a force as to encourage him to throw off the mask, and, at last, to reject the conditions offered him. Meanwhile, the rising in favor of the Bourbons, confirmed the allies in their purpose not to make peace with Bonaparte; and perseverance on their part, and ambition on his, led to the events which remain to be related. On the breaking off of these negotiations, the allied powers published a declaration, ascribing its procrastination and termination to Bonaparte.

Bonaparte suddenly moved from Vitry, still more to the southward, towards St. Dizier, Joinville, and even as far as Chaumont and Langres. By this unaccountable movement, from which no advantages proportionate to the risk he ran could possibly have been derived, he gave the allies an opportunity of effecting their junction, and of marching with their united forces towards Paris.

The allies took advantage of the opportunity Napoleon afforded them, by the desperate and extraordinary plan he had formed of passing between their armies, and of striking at their communication with the Rhine, intending, at the same time, to liberate the garrisons of Metz, &c. The extent and nature of this project was fully ascertained on the 23d. A movement was immediately ordered upon Vitry, to secure that place, and to endeavour to cut off Macdonald's corps, said to have been, at this time, on the left bank of the Marne, between Chalons and Vitry, to operate a junction with the troops under General Winzingerode, which had moved upon Chalons, and to unite both armies.

Their majesties the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia left Troyes on the 20th, and had their head-quarters at Pougy. The Emperor of Austria moved his head-quarters on the 19th to Bar-sur-Seine, with all the cabinet-ministers, and came on the 21st to Bar-sur-Aube.

On the evening of the 23d, the army broke up from Pougy, and having marched by Rameru and Dompierre, assembled, at day-break, near Sommequis; but the corps of Marshal Macdonald had crossed the Marne the preceding day, before it could be intercepted.

On the 24th, the junction with General Winzingerode was effected at Vitry and Chalons, and the Silesian army came within reach of co-operating with the grand army. On the following day, General Winzingerode, with his own and several other corps of cavalry, being left to observe the enemy, the united allied force began its movement by rapid and continued marches on Paris.

The corps of Marshals Mortier and Marmont were found at Vitry and Sommesons, and were driven back with loss, and pursued in the direction of Paris. At this time the emperor, the king, and field-marshal the Prince of Schwartzemberg, were at Fere Champenoise; and on the 26th at Treffaux. Field-marshal Blucher was at Etoges on the 26th, and continued his march on Meaux by Montmirail. In the course of that week not less than 100 cannon and 9,000 prisoners were taken, with several general officers. At the affair near Champenoise, Colonel Rappatel, late aid-de-camp to General Moreau, was killed while exhorting the French to surrender, and Colonel Neil Campbell, who was on this service, and who had been with the advanced Russian corps in all the affairs since his return from the siege of Dantzic, was severely wounded, having been run through the body by a Cossack, who mistook him for an enemy during one of the charges. The wound, however, was not mortal.

On the 27th, the imperial and royal head-quarters were at Coulomiers, and the Silesian army reached Meaux. On the 28th, their head-quarters were at Quincy. Bridges were prepared at Meaux and Triport. The Silesian army advanced to Clave in front of which town a severe action took place, in which the enemy was repulsed.

On the 29th, the emperor and the king, with Field-marshal Prince Schwartzemberg, crossed the Marne at Meaux, and the enemy being still in possession of the woods near Ville Parisis and Bondy, he was attacked and driven beyond Bondy towards Pantin: the head-quarters were established at the former of those places.

Field-marshal Blucher, the same day, marched in two columns to the right, pointing upon Montmartre, through Mory, Draucey, and St. Denis.

The enemy had improved the defences which the ground afforded on Montmartre, and in front of it, by redoubts and batteries, and had a considerable force of regular troops near the villages of Pantin, Romainville, and Belleville. The navigable canal, the woods and houses, together with some ground, so deep as to be nearly impassable for horses, afforded considerable means of resistance. A disposition for a general attack having been made on the 30th, the sixth corps, supported by the grenadiers of reserve, was engaged, at an early hour, to prevent the enemy from holding Pantin. The remainder of the troops, under the Prince-royal of Wurtemberg, was to turn the enemy on his right, and to push on to occupy, in succession, all the heights on the left of the road, Belleville inclusive. The day was considerably advanced before the troops reached their several positions, and the enemy made a determined resistance, especially at the village of Pantin: the whole of the force was commanded by the Duke of Treviso; the right wing by the Duke of Ragusa. A message had been sent, on the 29th, to deprecate resistance, and to explain that it must be vain, as the whole army was present; but the messenger was not received. In the evening of the 30th, Count Nesselrode was admitted within the barriers of Paris; and at the same time, one of the emperor's aid-de-camps was sent to Marshal Marmont, who agreed that all firing should cease in half-an-hour, if the allied sovereigns would consent that no part of the army should pass the barrier of Paris that night. This was consented to, and the enemy withdrew from Montmartre within the town. The advanced corps bivouacked within pistol-shot of the town. The emperor returned to Bondy with the field-marshal, and at four in the morning the deputies of the city arrived. Seventy cannon, three colours, and 500 men were taken. The number of the killed and wounded of the enemy was very considerable, but this victory was not gained without some loss on the part of the allies.

The Empress and King of Rome left Paris, March 29, by the advice of Prince Joseph, who remained behind to defend Paris, and who issued a proclamation, exhorting the inhabitants to be courageous, and adding, for encouragement, "I shall not quit you." Early on the 30th of March, he issued an order to defend Paris. At ten o'clock, the same day, he renewed the order. At eleven he fled, and at half-past eleven sent his aid-de-camp to repeat—"I am with you—Defend yourselves."

Four hours armistice having been agreed upon, for the purpose of treating of the conditions relative to the occupation of the city of Paris; the following articles were adjusted and signed.

Art. 1. "The corps of the marshals, Dukes of Treviso and Ragusa, shall evacuate the city of Paris, on the 31st of March, at seven o'clock in the morning.

2. "They shall take with them, all the appurtenances of their corps d'armée.

3. "Hostilities shall not commence until two hours after the evacuation of the city; that is to say, on the 31st of March, at nine o'clock in the morning.

4. "All the arsenals, military establishments, workshops, and magazines, shall be left in the same state they were previous to the present capitulation being proposed.

5. "The national or city-guard is entirely separated from the troops of the line. It is either to be kept on foot, or disarmed, or disbanded, according to the ulterior dispositions of the allied powers.

6. "The corps of the municipal gendarmerie shall in every respect share the fate of the national guard.

7. "The wounded and the stragglers remaining in Paris after seven o'clock shall be prisoners of war.

8. "The city of Paris is recommended to the generosity of the allied powers.

"Done at Paris, May 31, at two o'clock in the morning."

The cavalry, under his imperial highness the grand Archduke Constantine, and the guards of all the different allied forces, were formed in columns early in the morning, on the road from Bondy to Paris. The Emperor of Russia, with all his staff, his generals and their suites present, proceeded to Pantin, where the King of Prussia joined him with a similar cortège. These sovereigns, surrounded by the princes in the army, together with the prince field-marshal, and the Austrian état-major, passed the Fauxbourg St. Martin, and entered the barrier of Paris, about eleven o'clock; the Cossacks of the guard forming the advance of the march. Already was the crowd so enormous, as well as the acclamations so great, that it was difficult to move forward; but before the monarchs reached the Porte de St. Martin, to turn on the Boulevards, there was a moral impossibility of proceeding: all Paris seemed to be assembled and concentrated in one spot; one animus, or spring, evidently directed all their movements; they thronged in such masses round the emperor and the king, that, with all their condescending and gracious familiarity, extending their hands on all sides, it was in vain to attempt to satisfy the populace. The air resounded with peals of Vive l'Empereur Alexandre, "Vive notre libérateur." "Vive le Roi de Prusse." With these acclamations were afterwards mingled those of "Vive le Roi," "Vive Louis XVIII." "Vive les Bourbons," "A bas le Tyran." The white cockade appeared very generally; many of the national guards wore them.

The Emperor of Russia, the King of Prussia, and Prince Schwartzberg, made their entry into Paris, at the head of the allied troops, early on the 31st of March. The enthusiasm manifested on this occasion by the Parisians, manifested that the restoration of their legitimate king, the downfall of Bonaparte, and an honorable and permanent peace, were their most ardent wishes. The three chiefs, before they entered any house, remained in a square, to make their troops file off before them, to let discipline be observed, and to prevent all disorders. At one o'clock these great military and civil cases were fulfilled. The chiefs of the three armies entered the house of the Prince of Benevente; having asked for private lodgings, the Emperor of Russia was accommodated in the house of the Prince of Benevente; the King of Prussia in that of M. De Beaumanois, and Prince Schwartzberg in General Sebastian's.

On the same day, the Emperor of Russia issued the following declaration to the French people:—

"The armies of the allied powers have occupied the capital of France; the allied sovereigns receive favorably the wish of the French nation. They declare—"That if the conditions of peace ought to contain stronger guarantees when the question was to bind down the ambition of Bonaparte, they may be more favorable when, by a return to a wise government, France herself offers the assurance of this repose.

"The sovereigns proclaim in consequence, "That they will no more treat with Napoleon Bonaparte, nor with any of his family.

"That they respect the integrity of ancient France, as it existed under its legitimate kings: they may even do more, because they profess it as a principle, that, for the happiness of Europe, France must be great and strong.

"That they will recognize and guarantee the constitution which France shall adopt. They therefore invite the senate to name immediately a provisional government, which may provide for the wants of the administration, and prepare the constitution, which shall avail the French people.

"The intentions which I have expressed, are common to all the allied powers.

(Signed) "ALEXANDER."

On the 1st of April, the members of the senate met, in consequence of an extraordinary convocation; the Prince of Benevento being president. A provisional government was appointed, and it was decreed, that the Emperor Napoleon and his family had forfeited all right to the throne; and the French people and the army were, consequently, absolved from their oaths of allegiance. The Emperor of Russia having, on the 2d, received the homage of the senate, made the following observations:—

"A man who called himself my ally entered my states as an unjust aggressor: it was against him that I made war, and not against France. I am the friend of the French people. What you have just done redoubles this sentiment; it is just, it is wise, to give to France strong and liberal institutions, which may be conformable to the present state of knowledge: my allies and myself come only to protect the liberty of your decisions."

The emperor stopped a moment, and then proceeded with the most affecting emotion:—

"As a proof of the durable alliance which I mean to contract with your nation, I restore to it all the French prisoners who are in Russia: (amounting to near 200,000 men) the provisional government had already asked this of me: I grant it to the senate in consequence of the resolutions which it has taken to-day."

The Marquis of Wellington had proceeded to Toulouse, the enemy's rear-guard having been attacked and defeated at St. Gaudens by the advanced-guard of the cavalry attached to Sir R. Hill's corps, under Major-general Fane.

It is asserted, that General Lucotte had received Bonaparte's orders to blow up all the magazines of powder, shells, &c. in case the allies entered Paris, and the explosion was to be simultaneous with their entry. The general tore the order, horror-struck with its atrocity. The knowledge of this came to the ears of the Emperor Alexander; who sent the order of Wladimer, set in diamonds, to the general, accompanying it with a letter, in which his imperial majesty requested him to wear and consider it as a token of his having saved the capital of his country.

Bonaparte, when at Fontainebleau, thought of passing a decree, inflicting a penalty of death upon any one who should be found to have a newspaper in his pocket. The evening before his dethronement, he made a colonel a present of an estate in Westphalia. On the 4th of April, in the morning, he reviewed the troops, which he seemed to consider as his own. The marshals and generals, who had learned from the papers the resolutions of the senate and the provisional government, conversed together on the subject loud enough to be heard by Napoleon; but he appeared to pay no attention to what they said, and the review passed quietly. When it was over, Marshal Ney, as had been settled, entered the palace with him; and followed him into his cabinet, where he asked him if he was informed of the great revolution that had taken place at Paris? He replied, with all the composure he could, that he knew nothing of it; though he was doubtless well-informed of the whole. The marshal then gave him the Paris papers, which he seemed to read with attention; but he was only seeking time to find an answer.

Meanwhile came Marshal Lefebvre, who, addressing his late emperor in a feeling tone, said, "You are undone; you would not listen to the counsels of any of your servants, and now the senate has declared, that you have forfeited the throne." These words made such an impression on him, who was used to consider himself above all laws, that he immediately burst into a flood of tears; and, after some minutes' reflection, wrote an act of abdication in favor of his son.

On the 5th, several generals went to the Duke of Bassano, who was mostly alone with the emperor; to request him to dissuade Bonaparte from appearing on the parade: but he would not refrain from it. On that morning he had formed a plan, which he made the Duke of Bassano write and sign with him, to repair with 20,000 men, that he had still with him, to Italy, and join Prince Eugene: he repeated several times, "If I choose to go there, I am certain that all Italy will declare for me." On the parade he looked horribly pale and thoughtful, and his convulsive motions declared his internal struggles. He did not stop above eight or ten minutes. When he got into the palace, he sent for the Duke of Reggio, and asked him, if the troops would follow him? "No, sire, you have abdicated."—"Yes, but upon certain conditions."—"The soldiers," resumed the duke, "don't comprehend the difference; they think you have no right any longer to command them."

The marshals who had been dispatched to obtain accounts from Paris returned in the night, between twelve and one. Marshal Ney entered first—"Well, have you succeeded?" enquired Bonaparte. "Revolutions do not turn back: this has begun its course; it was too late; to-morrow the senate will recognise the Bourbons." Bonaparte then exclaimed, "Where shall I be able to live with my family?"—"Where your majesty shall please, and for example, at the Isle of Elba, with a revenue of six millions."—"Six millions! That is a great deal for a soldier such as I am. I see very well I must submit. Salute all my companions in arms." Soon after, Bonaparte became seriously indisposed. Dr. Corvisart repaired to Fontainebleau to attend him. Bonaparte was now accompanied by the English colonel Campbell, the Russian general, Schorvaloff, a Prussian and an Austrian general, and an escort of 1,500 of the allied troops. Though ill, he read the Paris papers every day: his hand trembled while reading, and his unsteady eye ran over the passages.

BOOK X.
CHAP. XII.
1814.

The corps of Marshal Marmont, amounting to 12,000 men, passed in the night of the 4th within the lines occupied by the allied troops. This corps took its cantonments near Versailles.

Marshals Ney and Macdonald, accompanied by General Caulaincourt, arrived at the same time, as bearers of Bonaparte's proposal, to submit to the decision of the senate and the people of France, and to abdicate in favor of his son. This proposition not having been agreed to, he surrendered himself to the wishes of the nation, and signed a formal abdication of the crown of France and Italy in the following terms:

"The allied powers having proclaimed that the Emperor Napoleon was the only obstacle to the re-establishment of the peace of Europe, the Emperor Napoleon, faithful to his oath, declares that he renounces for himself and his heirs the thrones of France and Italy; and that there is no personal sacrifice, even that of life, which he is not ready to make to the interest of France. Done at the palace of Fontainebleau, the 6th of April, 1814."

The senate afterwards announced the adoption of a constitution for the government of France, under the dominion of their ancient line of kings. There appeared no diversity of opinion in the nation. All obliged the call of the provisional government. Bonaparte stood alone and unprotected, in a country where, a few days before, he disposed at pleasure of the lives of its inhabitants.

The operations of this campaign had been conducted by Prince Schwartzenberg, in an able and distinguished manner. Exclusively of the talents he displayed in the field of battle, and the success which attended his career, the humane conduct he pursued on entering Paris increased the admiration he had excited. Where conciliation, where every kind of feeling of the heart was required to change a system of carnage and desolation to the protection of a people, (late a most bitter enemy) the character of this prince shone most brilliant. The Emperor of Russia, in estimation of his great services, decorated him with the grand order of St. Andrew, presented in diamonds.

When Bonaparte had accepted the conditions proposed to him, Marshals Ney and Macdonald and General Caulaincourt arranged with Prince Schwartzenberg the line of demarcation to be observed between the allied and French armies.

On the 12th, the members of the provisional government and the members of the ministerial departments, preceded and followed by the municipal body, and by numerous detachments of the national guards of Paris, went to the barrier of Bondy to meet his royal highness, Monsieur, brother to the king, and lieutenant-general of the kingdom. A little before one o'clock, his royal highness appeared without the barrier, accompanied by a great number of the grand officers, the officers of his household, and a number of the marshals of France, who had previously advanced to receive him.

Monsieur, and all the persons who accompanied him, were on horseback: his royal highness was dressed in the uniform of the national guard.

The members of the provisional government, preceded by the master of the ceremonies, advanced near his royal highness. The Prince of Benevente, in the name of the provisional government, addressed the prince, and received a gracious reply.

His royal highness then entered the barrier; M. le Baron de Chabrol, prefect of the department of the Seine, then presented to his royal highness the municipal body of Paris, and observed—

"Your royal highness will accept the vows of the whole nation. He will every where hear acclamations. He will see hope revive in every heart; and the happiness of his country will console him for his long sufferings."

The allied sovereigns, deeming it more expedient that the solemnity should be purely French, did not attend. As the Bourbon family, however, had been for a length of time resident in England, Lord Castlereagh deemed it prudent to meet his royal highness at the barrier, and accompany him into Paris. The Bourbon standard now began to be hoisted in every French department.

BOOK XI.

CHAPTER I.

Events which led to Hostilities between Great Britain and the United States.—Conduct of the American and of the British Governments.

SINCE the affair between the Little Belt and the President, as related in book ix. chapter 9, much dissatisfaction was expressed by the American government, which was considerably increased by the artifices of Bonaparte, whose interest it was to engage Great Britain in a war with the United States. As these hostilities have been occasionally alluded to in the French proclamations, inserted in our preceding books, we shall here relate the events which led to them.

Captain Bingham, of his majesty's ship the Little Belt, declared, that the attack had been commenced by the American frigate, the President; that it was outrageous and unprovoked, and that he only resisted the violence first offered to him.

The following was the American official account of this affair, which was published as a copy of a letter from Commodore Rogers to the secretary of the navy.

United States Frigate President, off Sandy Hook, 23d May, 1811.

"Sir,—I regret extremely being under the necessity of representing to you an event that occurred on the night of the 16th instant, between the ship under my command, and his Britannic majesty's ship of war the Little Belt, commanded by Captain Bingham: the result of which has given me much pain, as well on account of the injury she sustained, as that I should have been compelled to the measure that produced it, by a vessel of her inferior force. The circumstances are as follow: On the 16th instant, at twenty-five minutes past meridian, in seventeen fathoms water, Cape Henry bearing S. W. distant fourteen or fifteen leagues, a sail was discovered from our mast-head, in the east, standing towards us under a press of sail. At half-past one the symmetry of her upper sails (which were at this time distinguished from our deck) and her making signals, shewed her to be a man of war. At forty-five minutes past one, p. m. hoisted our ensign and pendant; when, finding our signals not answered, she wore and stood to the southward. Being desirous of speaking her, and of ascertaining what she was, I now made sail in chase; and by half-past three, p. m. found we were coming up with her; as by this time the upper part of her stern began to show itself above the horizon. The wind now began, and continued gradually to decrease, so as to prevent my being able to approach her sufficiently before sunset, to discover her actual force (which the position she preserved during the chase was calculated to conceal), or to judge even to what nation she belonged, as she appeared studiously to decline shewing her colours. At fifteen or twenty minutes past seven, p. m. the chase took in her studding sails, and soon after hauled up her courses, and hauled by the wind on the starboard-tack; she at the same time hoisted an ensign or flag at her mizen peak, but it was too dark for me to discover what nation it represented: now, for the first time, her broadside was presented to our view; but night had so far progressed, that although her appearance indicated she was a frigate, I was unable to determine her actual force.

At fifteen minutes before eight, p. m. being about a mile and a half from her, the wind at the time very light, I directed Captain Ludlow to take a position to windward of her, and on the same tack, within short speaking distance. This however the commander of the chase appeared from his manœuvres to be anxious to prevent, as he wore and hauled by the wind, on different tacks, four times successively between this period and the time of our arriving at the position which I had ordered to be taken. At fifteen or twenty minutes past eight, being a little forward of her weather beam, and distant from seventy to a hun-

BOOK XI.

CHAP. I.

1811.

English. At the approach of that period the French minister stated, in a letter to General Armstrong, "I am authorised to declare to you, Sir, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that after the 1st of November they will cease to have effect; it being understood that, in consequence of this declaration, the English shall revoke their orders in council, and renounce the new principles of blockade which they have wished to establish." On the 2d of November Mr. Madison proclaimed to the people of the United States that the French decrees were revoked, though he had abundant reason to know the previous acts required of Great Britain would not be performed. The French emperor succeeded in attaching the blame of the non-performance of his promise to the British government, and of exasperating the United States against that government.

Mr. Foster having been commissioned to communicate the sentiments of Great Britain to America, he delivered them in a firm and decisive language; but his communication not corresponding with the expectations of the American government, the president issued the following proclamation for convening a congress:—

"Whereas great and weighty matters, claiming the consideration of the congress of the United States, form an extraordinary occasion for convening them, I do, by these presents, appoint Monday, the 4th day of November next, for their meeting at the city of Washington; hereby requiring the respective senators and representatives then and there to assemble in congress, in order to receive such communication as may then be made to them, and to consult and determine on such measures as in their wisdom may be deemed meet for the welfare of the United States.

"In testimony whereof, I have caused the (L.S.) seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed, and signed the same with my hand.

"Done at the city of Washington, the 24th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1811; and of the independence of the United States the 36th.

"By the President, JAMES MADISON.

"Secretary of State, JAMES MONROE."

Previous to the meeting of congress the American papers were filled with scurrilous invectives against Great Britain, as the following extracts from the Philadelphia Journal, dated August 5, will evince:

"The cup is full!—The long impending ire, the smothered hatred, the disguised war, which assumed so many aspects, which has ultimately plundered and promised redress, and professed justice only to vary the forms of injustice, which has oppressed the commerce, corrupted the morals, insulted the dignity, and violated the rights of this free and independent nation—which has murdered our people, and carried thousands into the most odious of all bondage, at length assumes an aspect less treacherous, because a more open and determined hostility.

"Great Britain at length avows her injustice, and once more menaces our independence.

"From the seat of the United States' government, and from England, we at the same moment have received advices which corroborate each other, and determine the fact, that Great Britain has resolved to make war upon us.

"Prior to the receipt of these advices, we had received authentic information of the course already pursued by Mr. Foster, at Washington. Upon his first arrival we had suggested, that five or six weeks would determine whether the 'intentions' of the British government were 'wicked or charitable.' The youth and inconsequence of this gentleman had induced an opinion, that he was intended to be one of those messengers whom Pope Sixtus V. described, by the smoothness of their chins, better adapted to convey billet-doux than rescripts—to partake of a carnival than to announce boisterous war; we supposed him sent, like some of his predecessors, to intrigue, or, like others, to amuse or abuse our government—Hammond, Liston, Merry, Erskine, Rose, Jackson, and Morier, had, in succession, been employed upon this mission; and, upon considering their course of conduct, it was not easy to believe, that this young gentleman was to be the agent of a policy more auspicious. The distresses in which the detestable nature of British policy had involved that nation, induced some to believe that necessity had taught her justice; and the coming of Foster was, with a credulity which has never been diminished by disappointment or by reason, considered by thousands as the final measure which was to heal all former wounds, and put a stop to future injuries.

"Others, and we among this class, believed, that as he could not have been the person selected, if any thing like substantial justice was to be done, his mission was to be only a business of amusement and procrastination—that he was to make no distinct promises, but to carry on a discussion of contingent propositions, and to give aid to Messrs. Pickering and Co. in their undertakings.

"It appears that we had mistaken the character of the mission, and that the minister's valet would have executed the service upon which Mr. Foster was sent, with as much skill and as much good manners as the diplomatist himself.

"Mr. Foster has fallen nothing short of the insolence of one of his predecessors, in the style and port which he has assumed, and he has exceeded him in personal indecorum, and even personal rudeness.

"Mr. Foster, besides presenting some acrimonious representations on the subject of the rencontre with the Little Belt, also undertook to demand, categorically, that the United States should repeal, without delay, the non-importation law; and that they should also demand of France the repeal of her decrees, as they applied to England.

"On the subject of the Little Belt, our government displayed an alacrity to give the most satisfactory explanations, and it is presumed did so; but on the subject of the non-importation law, it was replied, that the acts of legislation belonged to the congress of the United States, which would meet in November, and it would be with that body to act in their provinces as wisdom and justice should direct. But that on the question, as it related to France, or any other nation, the United States would not interfere but in concerns of the United States alone. That the United States had given to Great Britain, in common with France, a fair and liberal opportunity to obtain not only an uninterrupted commercial intercourse with the United States, but if she had accepted the terms, an exclusion of France in her favour; that Great Britain had not chosen to pursue that path, consistent with justice and her commercial interests, by leaving the flag of the United States with free possession of the neutral rights of an independent nation.—That France had embraced the proposition, and that it had now become an engagement for which the national faith of the United States was pledged, so long as Great Britain chose to persist in her aggressions on neutral commerce; that as it related to France, she had complied with the engagement, and the United States flag was, as to her, unrestrained and uninterrupted on the high seas—and the United States had no right to interfere in any matters of dispute between the two belligerents, in which she was not concerned, and could not, and would not, make any representation on the subject.

"The conduct and menaces held forth by Mr. Foster, on this occasion, we cannot give in expressions sufficiently forcible or characteristic; but to Mr. Monroe, personally, he is represented as having demanded as we have above stated; and upon the mild and tempered answer of Mr. Monroe, he assumed a tone of arrogance and insult; and declared, that if the non-importation law was not immediately set aside, a force beyond anything Mr. Monroe might expect, would appear on our coasts, and not only annihilate our foreign but our coasting trade.

"It is stated that Mr. Monroe treated these menaces with dignity and temper, and chid the young gentleman with the equanimity of a sage, for the rudeness of his manner and expressions. This unexpected occurrence delayed the departure of Mr. Monroe for Virginia, for three days, and Mr. Barlow was also delayed for a like period.

"Such is the state of affairs with Great Britain. The president, before his departure, is said to have given directions to have every vessel belonging to the United States put in a state of complete equipment; and that all military works on the sea-board be completed without delay."

Hence it appears that America, feeling sore at the want of condescension in England, but still more at her dignified language, began to suspect an insult where none was intended, and to regard as an act of hostility what was merely a mistake, or, giving it the worst name, the irregularity of an individual. The trial of Commodore Rodgers, which took place in a court of inquiry before congress assembled, was some act of satisfaction on the part of the American government for the outrage upon the Little Belt. Impartiality demands, that we should give a brief outline of the evidence furnished to this court, on the oaths of the several witnesses examined. The court of inquiry consisted of Commodore Stephen Decatur, president, Captain Charles Stewart, Captain Isaac Chauncey, and W. Paulding, jun. esq. judge-advocate.

The first witness examined was Charles Ludlow, master-commandant, and acting captain of the President.—He was on board the ship at the time of the action with the Little Belt, on the night of the 16th of May last. The Little Belt had her top-sails aback. From his position he was uncertain which fired the first gun; but the second was from the President; and was instantly followed by three cannon and musketry from the Belt. Commodore Rodgers ordered to fire low, and with two round shot. After a short pause the Belt recommenced firing, as did the President. The Belt soon appeared ungovernable, and lay bow on towards the President, when Commodore R. observed, that some accident must have happened to her, and ceased firing. Her gaff was down, and her main-top-sail-yard on the cap; and mizen, too, he thinks. The action continued fourteen or fifteen minutes, including the interval. There was nothing but round and grape shot fired, or on deck, on board the President. The ship was not on fire, or any part of her, and did not sheer off after the action. Another broadside would probably have sunk the Little Belt. Did not know or believe any part of commodore's official account was untrue or incorrect.

John Orde Creighton, first lieutenant.—Was stationed at the fourth division of guns, on the upper deck. Commodore Rodgers hailed first, then a second time, when a shot was fired, as he believes, from the Little Belt, no gun having been fired or provocation given on board the President. The orders of Commodore R. were to keep the guns at half-cock, and guard against accidents. After receiving the Little Belt's broadside, was ordered to fire. The Belt was silenced in five minutes, and the President ceased. The Belt renewed the fire, and Commodore R. returned it, and silenced the Belt again in five minutes. Boarded the Little Belt the next morning; Commodore Rogers sent a friendly message, expressing regret for the occurrence, and offers of assistance. Captain Bingham said he took the President for a Frenchman. President was not on fire, and did not sheer off. Nothing but round and grape was fired or on deck. Another broadside would probably have sunk the Belt. Commodore's account confirmed.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. I.

1811.

Henry Caldwell, commandant of marines.—Heard the hailing; was looking at the Little Belt, and saw the first shot proceed from her; on which Commodore Rodgers said, "What is that?" and he answered, "she has fired into us." Orders were then given to fire. Belt silenced in five minutes. Commodore R. was anxious to stop his fire, and did so. The Belt renewed the action, and in six or seven minutes was silenced again, when Commodore R. was anxious to prevent mischief, and stop his fire. No fire or sheering off. Commodore's account confirmed.

Raymond H. Y. Perry, junior lieutenant and signal-officer.—Was on the quarter-deck, near Commodore Rodgers's elbow. The commodore hailed; got no reply—hailed a second time, and got none. Heard a gun, and was looking at the Belt, which fired it, previous to any gun or provocation from the President. The Belt was silenced in five minutes, and orders were sent to every division of guns on board the President to cease. The Belt renewed the fire, and the President also. In six minutes the Belt was silenced again, and the commodore was very anxious to stop the firing on board the President. No fire or sheering off. The Belt was in a very dangerous situation, and would, probably, have been sunk by another broadside. Heard hailing from the Belt, and understood they said their colours were down; and so reported. Commodore Rodgers hailed, "Have you struck your colours?" and was answered, "I have, and am in great distress." Lights were on board the President during the night. Commodore Rodgers's statement confirmed.

Andrew L. B. Madison, lieutenant of marines.—Was on the gangway. Heard the commodore hail first, then waited fifteen or sixteen seconds, time enough for a reply, but got none, and hailed again; when the Belt fired a gun from her gangway. Saw the flash, and heard the report; no gun or provocation had been offered by Commodore Rodgers. In six seconds a gun was fired from the President, when instantly the Belt fired three guns, and then her broadside and musketry. Belt silenced in six or seven minutes. Firing stopped in the President. In two or three minutes Belt renewed the action, and in four or five minutes was again silenced; when Commodore Rodgers ordered his fire to cease, and appeared anxious to prevent damage. No firing or sheering off of the President. Commodore's report confirmed.

Captain Caldwell confirmed the account of the first and second guns and broadside, as given by the other witnesses.

Jacob Mull, sailing-master.—Was on the quarter-deck. Commodore Rodgers hailed, and got no answer, but "halloo." After sufficient time hailed again, and got no reply, but a shot, without provocation. In three or four seconds returned the shot, and got a general fire from the Little Belt. Thought the Belt a heavy frigate until next day. Action continued fourteen or fifteen minutes, including three or four minutes' interval. Little Belt could have fired again, but President could have sunk her. Commodore's official account is true.

Lieut. Creighton thought the Little Belt a frigate (excepting her feeble defence,) until next day. Captain Bingham told him the President's colours were not hoisted, but he recollected the pendant. It is the usage, as before stated by another witness, for the President to be prepared for action on coming alongside an armed vessel. Thought the Little Belt displayed bad management, or want of conduct, in her defence.

Joseph Smith, midshipman, acting as master's-mate.—Commanded the fourth division of guns. Heard Commodore Rodgers hail, and no reply for five seconds. Heard second hail, and was looking at the Little Belt when the first gun was fired by her, before a shot or any provocation was given from the President. The commodore fired one gun, then the Little Belt three, and action continued. Thought the Little Belt a frigate. The duration of the action, and orders to cease, as before stated. The last order to stop firing was received by three different officers. Commodore R.'s statement confirmed.

Henry Dennison, acting chaplain.—Was on the quarter-deck. Little Belt was seventy or eighty yards distant. Heard Commodore R. hail, and the reply, and the second hail—then a gun, he thinks from the Belt, as he felt no jar in the President, and no gun or provocation had been given by Commodore R. Account of Commodore R. confirmed.

Michael Roberts, boatswain.—Was on the fore-castle, saw the flash and heard the gun from the Little Belt, before any shot or provocation had been given from the President. Had not seen the commodore's account.

Richard Carson, midshipman.—Was on the fore-castle and gangways. Commodore R. hailed, and was answered by repeating his words; second hail was answered by a shot. Was looking at the Belt, and saw and heard the gun, before any provocation from Commodore Rodgers. Gun from the President was followed by the Belt's broadside, as stated by others. Commodore's account confirmed.

Matthew C. Perry, Silas Duncan, and John M'Clack, midshipmen, gave their evidence to the same effect.

Thomas Gamble, second lieutenant.—Com-manded the first division of guns. Commodore Rodgers hailed, "Ship a-hoy!" Was answered, "halloo." Asked "what ship is that?" Received his own words repeated in reply. Hailed again, "what ship is that?" Then a gun from the Belt. Heard no gun or provocation from the President—swears no gun was fired from his division. Nothing but round and grape shot fired after the action commenced. Commodore's orders as before stated; when firing ceased finally. Belt was in a favorable position for firing, but another broadside from the President probably would have sunk her. Saw no colours on the Belt, and took her for a frigate of thirty-six or thirty-eight guns. No firing on board or sheering off by the President; statement of Commodore Rodgers confirmed.

John Neese, captain of the first gun.—In the first division on the gun-deck, was looking at the Little Belt, and saw and heard her first fire.

Lieutenant Creighton testified farther; that when the Belt was silenced the second time, she luffed up towards the commodore, instead of keeping way, as she should have done, to fire at the President, and would have done if her rudder had been free. Commodore Rodgers expressed much humanity and anxiety to stop the firing. Lieutenant Creighton also testified to the officers of assistance from Commodore Rodgers to the Little Belt the next morning.

Alexander James Dallas, third lieutenant, com-manded third division guns; heard first and second hail, and question repeated back from the Little Belt; then third hail and gun; was looking at the Belt when she fired, when no gun or provocation had been given from the President; was in the bridle-port when the Belt fired, and after the shot was received, got into the port and fired a gun in return, from general order, without particular direction. A broadside from the Belt immediately succeeded. None but round and grape used in his division, and no fire or sheering off. A broadside more would probably have sunk the Belt. Commodore Rodgers was very anxious to stop the firing.—Commodore's statement confirmed.

John M. Funk, fourth lieutenant, commanded third division gun-deck; heard hail, reply; second hail, and gun from Belt, as before; heard no gun or provocation from President, and there certainly was none from his division; gun from Belt returned from President in five or six seconds, and broadside from Belt ensued.—Orders of Commodore R. as before. Round and grape only fired. No fire or sheering off. Another broadside would have sunk the Belt. Commodore R. exerted himself to stop the firing.—Official account confirmed.

Peter Gamble, midshipman, was on gun-deck, at second division; heard first shot from Little Belt, and felt no jar on board the President. No gun or provocation from Commodore Rodgers.—Confirmed the official account.

Edward Babbet, midshipman, was on gun-deck, at third division; was looking at the Belt, and saw and heard the first gun from her. No gun or provocation had been given by the President.—Official account confirmed.

Mr. Mull testified that the damage on board the President was one boy wounded; a shot in the mainmast, and another in the foremast, with some of the back-stays cut away; but not a single shot of any kind from the Little Belt struck the hull of the President.

Edward Rutledge Slubrick, midshipman, was forward on gun-deck, at first division; was looking at the Belt, and saw and heard the first fire from her before any gun or provocation from the President.

Philip Dickenson Spencer, midshipman, was confident that the first shot came from the Little Belt.

Breasted Barnes, carpenter, was on gun-deck to attend pumps, and looking at the Belt when she fired the first shot, before gun or provocation from Commodore Rodgers. The President did not receive a shot of any kind in the hull, but one in her main-mast and another in her foremast.

Edward Walker, captain first gun, fourth division fore-castle, from hearing the report and feeling no jar, believed the first shot came from the Belt. Moses Dunbar, second captain (first absent) second gun, fourth division, was looking at the Little Belt, and saw her fire first. George Simmons, third captain, (first absent) third gun, fourth division; John M'Cornick, second captain (first absent) fourth gun, fourth division; William Campbell, first gun, fourth division, quarter-deck, all testified the same as Moses Dunbar.

Thomas Taylor, captain second gun, quarter-deck, saw the Little Belt fire six seconds first. Six captains of guns on the quarter-deck said the same.

Mr. Mull testified that the commodore shewed great humanity.—Lieutenant Dallas heard two reports,—Midshipman S. H. Stringham, J. H.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. I.

1811.

Ludlow, and D. G. Ingraham, saw the Little Belt fire the first shot.

Here the examination closed, and the result of the trial was the acquittal of Commodore Rodgers. The American government, by putting the commodore on his trial, disavowed the act as belonging to themselves, and transferred it to the individual. They divested, therefore, the outrage upon the Little Belt, of a national insult, and rendered it as a private or individual action. But the record of this trial, the evidence, the defence, and the sentence, were not communicated to the British government; and, of course, it was suspected that the whole was an affair of management; that the evidence had been wilfully procured on the part of the government of the country to answer a particular purpose; and that the sentence was unjust; therefore, instead of being a satisfaction, it was by some considered as an aggravation of the injury.

In a court of inquiry held at Halifax, relative to this business, the evidence considerably varied. This court was held before the Right Honorable Lord James Townshend, captain of his majesty's ship Eolus, and senior officer at Halifax, Nova Scotia; Charles John Austen, esq. captain of his majesty's ship Cleopatra; and Alexander Gordon, esq. commander of his majesty's ship Rattler.

Lieutenant Moberly, senior lieutenant, stated, "that on the 16th inst. while cruising off the coast of America, Cape Charles bearing west fifty-four miles, at eleven a. m. saw a strange sail,—that she was a lugger was reported from the mast-head, on the star-board beam; we then steering S. W. the wind aft, or a little on the starboard quarter; on which took in our studding sails, and hauled our wind for her on the star-board tack;—shortly after, made her out to be a ship. At thirty past two p. m. having then made out the chance to be a frigate, with a commodore's broad pendant flying, being then about six miles, and not having answered any of our private signals, viz. 275, private signal, and our number, concluded her to be the American frigate United States; showed our colours, and steered our course south. Set studding-sails at five o'clock,—observed the frigate make all sail; and to keep more away from us; at seven found she was gaining on us fast. Captain Bingham then thinking it best to speak her before dark, shortened sail, and hove to, colours up; we then making out her stars in her broad pendant, beat to quarters, and got clear for action, a second time, having beat before at two p. m.; double shotted and double breached the guns. At fifty past seven, observed the frigate to have shortened sails to top-sails, top-gallant-sails, and jib, and standing down as if with an intention of passing under our stern; wore twice to evade this. Captain Bingham hailed, and was not answered; wore again, to close to us, on larboard beam. Captain Bingham hailed the ship, "a-hoy!" which was repeated word for word by the frigate: Captain Bingham asked what ship that was, which was also repeated as before; and on asking a second time, was answered by a broadside. Captain Bingham was then standing on the midship gun, jumped off, and gave orders to fire, which was done in less than a minute after her first fire, we being quite ready, guns pointed, and continued firing for about an hour, when the frigate ceased firing, and hailed us to know what ship this was. Captain Bingham answered, his majesty's ship Little Belt, several times, before he understood us. He then asked if our colours were down? No! was Captain Bingham's answer. Captain Bingham then hailed to know what ship that was; and was answered the United States frigate,—the name we could not understand. In the mean time the frigate had filled, and was standing from us;—a short time after lost sight of her,—hove-to for the night, having no sail set. At day-light, saw a sail to windward; made her out to be the same we had engaged;—at six she bore up for us under easy sail; at eight she passed within hail, asked permission to send a boat on board, which was granted: boat came on board, staid ten minutes, then returned; understood the frigate to be the President, belonging to the United States, Commodore Rodgers; observed the President to fill and stand on, on the starboard tack, under her top-sails."

Lieutenant Thomas Leveel, Mr. James Franklin, boatswain, and Mr. Hinselwood, purser, corroborated the whole of the foregoing statement.

In addition to whom, Mr. William Turner, surgeon, stated, "that at ten minutes past eight o'clock p. m. Captain Bingham hailed the stranger twice, very loudly, but received no answer: about five minutes after, Captain Bingham again hailed, and was answered from the frigate, to what purpose I could not distinctly understand. Captain Bingham again hailed twice, and immediately heard the frigate fire, and the whole passed over us. I then distinctly heard Captain Bingham give orders to fire away: we returned the broadside within the space of twenty seconds; the action continued with great vigour for about forty-five minutes, to the best of my judgment."

"The examination and information of William Burkit, mariner, taken before John Howe and Thomas Boggs, esquires, two of his majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Halifax, this 22d day of June, in the year of our Lord 1811; who, being duly sworn, depose and saith, that he was born at Deptford, in England; that he is about twenty-three years of age; that he has reason to think he has a mother still living at

Deptford; that he left home about three years ago, and went to Montego-bay, Jamaica; that he left that place afterwards, and proceeded to New York, in a brig called the Pizarro; that some time in August, 1809, being in a state of intoxication, he was forcibly carried on-board the United States armed schooner Revenge, in which he continued until she was cast away in Long Island Sound; that he was afterwards transferred to the United States' ship the President; that he was entered on-board the Revenge, and afterwards on-board the President, by the name of Elijah Shephardson; that he was on-board the President the first week in May last, when that ship was lying at Annapolis, in Maryland; that Commodore Rodgers suddenly came on-board from Havre-de-Grace, where he had been with his family; that instantly after the arrival of the commodore, all was bustle in the ship; that the sails, some of which were unbent, were immediately bent, and the ship got ready, with all possible expedition, to proceed to sea; that she got under weigh next day, and proceeded down the river; that they spoke a brig, which said they had been boarded the day before by a British cruiser, and that she had taken a man from her, who had been sent back again; that, as they were going down the river, they got up a much larger quantity of shot and wads than had ever been customary on any other occasion, while he was on-board the ship; and that he knows this to have been the case, from having held the station of quarter-gunner; that after proceeding to sea, they cruised off the different parts of the coast without any thing materially happening until the 16th of May; that at twelve o'clock on that day, being below at dinner, word was brought that a frigate, supposed to be British, was in sight; that orders were then given for clearing away the bulk-heads, and preparing for action; that, soon after, all hands were beat to quarters; that every thing was then immediately got ready for action; that at this time it was about two o'clock; that all sails were then set, and they went eagerly in chase of the supposed frigate; that orders were soon after given for pricking and firing the guns; before dark, while they were approaching nearer the chase, orders were given to take the aprons off the guns; and at that time this deponent looked at the ship they were in chase of, through the bridle port, and he saw her colours flying; that he saw red in them, but could not correctly ascertain what colours they were; that at the distance they were, he is satisfied that with glasses they could easily be distinguished; that he heard Lieutenant Belding, who had a glass, and who commanded in his division, say, that her colours were British; that when this deponent looked at her, he could see her hull, and was satisfied that she was a small ship;

that they continued after this period to approach her until between eight and nine o'clock, when they were within pistol-shot; that Commodore Rodgers then gave orders to stand by their guns, and not to fire till orders were given; that the commodore then hailed; and when he was hailing a second time, a gun in the division to which this belongs, being the second division, went off, he thinks by accident; and that there were four or five men leaning on the gun at the time; that he instantly turned, to acquaint the lieutenant that the gun had gone off by accident, the lieutenant then standing only three guns from him; that before he could do this, the whole broadside of the President was discharged; and that immediately after a general order was given, "fire away as quick as possible;" that before the firing of the gun of this division, which he thinks went off by accident, and the broadside which immediately followed, this deponent is satisfied, as he was looking out of the port, and distinctly saw the Little Belt, that not a gun had been fired from her; that the President, he thinks, continued firing about half an hour without cessation; that an order was then given to cease firing; that the President then filled her main-top-sail, and stood from the Little Belt, with her head to the southward, and continued all night on that tack, without heaving to; that the commodore, before he steered from the Little Belt, hailed her to know if she had struck; the only part of the answer given, that he could distinctly hear or understand, was, that she was a British ship.

"This deponent further saith, that the President was wounded in her foremast and mainmast, a 22-pound shot having entered each of them; and the rest of the night, after the engagement, they were employed in repairing the damage sustained in the rigging. This deponent farther saith, that the crew of the President consists of about 500 men, upwards of 300 of which he knew to be British seamen, from having conversed with them, and having heard them declare they were so, and from many of them having designated the place they came from; that the engagement with the Little Belt had excited great disgust in the British seamen on-board the President, who had manifested their reluctance to fight against their country; that one man, in particular, had so plainly expressed this feeling, as to have drawn on him the resentment of Commodore Rodgers, who had put him in irons; in which situation he remained when this deponent left the ship for the aforesaid defence, and for having said the first gun was fired from the President.

"This deponent further saith, that, after the President came into New York, and was lying in the North River, that, by the assistance of his hammock lashings, he got in the night from the 1811.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. I.

fore-chains into the river, and swam to a place of safety; and has since procured a passage to Halifax.

"WILLIAM BURKIT, his X Mark.

"Sworn at Halifax, the day and year aforesaid, before us,

"JOHN HOWE, } Justices of the Peace."

"THO. BOGGS, }

Bristol, July 25, 1811.

"John Russell deposes, that he belonged to the President American frigate; that he did his duty in the foretop; was quartered at the aftermost gun on the fore-castle, before they fell in with the Little Belt. The commodore informed the ship's company, that he was ordered to demand two American seamen that had been pressed by a British frigate; if they were not given up, he was to take them by force: when they went down to the Little Belt the guns were double-shotted, and loaded with grape; that the first gun was fired from the President, but he believes from accident, as no orders were given from the quarter-deck to fire; the guns had locks, and were all cocked. After the action, he was informed by the men in the waste, that a man was entangled with the lanyard of the lock, that occasioned the gun to go off."

The (Signed) "JOHN X RUSSELL.
mark of.

"The within-named John Russell was sworn in the truth of the within affidavit, before me, one of his majesty's justices of the peace for the city and county of Bristol, the 25th day of July, 1811."
(Signed) "DAVID EVANS."

On the meeting of Congress, this affair was particularly dwelt upon in the president's speech, communicated by Mr. Edward Coles, his private secretary, and which was as follows:

"Fellow-citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives,

"In calling you together sooner than a separation from your homes would otherwise have been required; I yielded to considerations drawn from the posture of our foreign affairs; and in fixing the present for the time of your meeting, regard was had to the probability of farther developments of the policy of the belligerent powers towards this country, which might the more unite the national councils in the measures to be pursued.

"At the close of the last session of congress, it was hoped that the successive confirmations of the extinction of the French decrees, so far as they violated our neutral commerce, would have induced the government of Great Britain to repeal its orders in council; and thereby authorize a removal of the existing obstructions to her commerce with the United States

"Instead of this reasonable step towards satisfaction and friendship between the two nations, the orders were, at a moment when least to have been expected, put into more rigorous execution; and it was communicated through the British envoy just arrived, that, whilst the revocation of the edicts of France, as officially made known to the British government, was denied to have taken place, it was an indispensable condition of the repeal of the British orders, that commerce should be restored to a footing that would admit the productions and manufactures of Great Britain, when owned by neutrals, into markets shut against them by her enemy; the United States being given to understand, that, in the mean time, a continuance of their non-importation act would lead to measures of retaliation.

"At a later date it has, indeed, appeared, that a communication to the British government, of fresh evidence of the repeal of the French decrees against our neutral trade, was followed by an intimation, that it had been transmitted to the British plenipotentiary here, in order that it might receive full consideration in the depending discussions. This communication appears not to have been received: but the transmission of it hither, instead of founding on it the actual repeal of the orders, or assurances that the repeal would ensue, will not permit us to rely on any effective change in the British cabinet. To be ready to meet, with cordiality, satisfactory proofs of such a change, and to proceed, in the mean time, in adapting our measures to the views which have been disclosed through that minister, will best consult our whole duty.

"In the unfriendly spirit of those disclosures, indemnity and redress for other wrongs have continued to be withheld; and our coasts and the mouths of our harbours have again witnessed scenes, not less derogatory to the dearest of our national rights than vexatious to the regular course of our trade.

"Among the occurrences produced by the conduct of British ships of war hovering on our coasts, was an encounter between one of them and the American frigate commanded by Captain Rodgers, rendered unavoidable on the part of the latter, by a fire commenced without cause by the former; whose commander is, therefore, alone chargeable with the blood unfortunately shed in maintaining the honor of the American flag. The proceedings of a court of inquiry, requested by Captain Rodgers, are communicated; together with the correspondence relating to the occurrence between the secretary of state and his Britannic majesty's envoy. To these are added, the several correspondences which have passed on the subject of the British orders in council; and to both, the correspondence relating to the Floridas, in which congress will be made acquainted with the interposition which the government of Great Britain has thought proper to make against the proceedings of the United States.

"The justness and fairness which have been evinced on the part of the United States towards France, both before and since the revocation of her decrees, authorised an expectation that her government would have followed up that measure by all such others as were due to our reasonable claims, as well as dictated by its amicable professions. No proof, however, is yet given of an intention to repair the other wrongs done to the United States; and, particularly to restore the great amount of American property seized and condemned under edicts, which, though not affecting our neutral relations, and therefore, not entering into questions between the United States and other belligerents, were nevertheless founded in such unjust principles, that the reparation ought to have been prompt and simple.

"In addition to this and other demands of strict right on that nation, the United States have much reason to be dissatisfied with the rigorous and unexpected restrictions to which their trade with the French dominions has been subjected; and which, if not discontinued, will require, at least, corresponding restrictions on importations from France into the United States.

"On all those subjects our minister-plenipotentiary, lately sent to Paris, has carried with him the necessary instructions; the result of which will be communicated to you; and by ascertaining the ulterior policy of the French government towards the United States, will enable you to adapt to it that of the United States towards France.

"Our other foreign relations remain without unfavorable changes. With Russia they are on the best footing of friendship. The ports of Sweden have afforded proofs of friendly dispositions towards our commerce in the councils of that nation also. And the information from our special minister to Denmark, shews, that the mission had been attended with valuable effects to our citizens, whose property had been so extensively violated and endangered by cruisers under the Danish flag.

"Under the ominous indications which commanded attention, it became a duty to exert the means committed to the executive department, in providing for the general security. The works of defence on our maritime frontier have accordingly been prosecuted with an activity leaving little to be added for the completion of the most important ones; and, as particularly suited for co-operation in emergencies, a portion of the gun-boats have, in particular harbours, been ordered into use. The ships of war before in commission, with the addition of a frigate, have been chiefly employed as a cruising guard to the rights of our coast; and such a disposition has been made of our land-forces, as was thought to promise the services most appropriate and important. In this disposition is included a force consisting of regulars and militia, embodied in the Indian territory, and marched towards the north-west frontier. This measure was made requisite by several murders and depredations committed by Indians; but more especially by the menacing preparations and aspect of a combination of them on the Wabash, under the influence and direction of a fanatic of the Schawanese tribe. With these exceptions, the Indian tribes retain their peaceable dispositions towards us, and their usual pursuits.

"I must now add, that the period is arrived, which claims from the legislative guardians of the national rights a system of more ample provisions for maintaining them. Notwithstanding the scrupulous justice, the protracted moderation, and the multiplied efforts on the part of the United States, to substitute, for the accumulating dangers to the peace of the two countries, all the mutual advantages of re-established friendship and confidence; we have seen, that the British cabinet perseveres, not only in withholding a remedy for other wrongs, so long and so loudly calling for it, but in the execution brought home to the threshold of our territory, of measures which, under existing circumstances, have the character as well as the effect of war on our lawful commerce.

"With this evidence of hostile inflexibility, in trampling on rights which no independent nation can relinquish, congress will feel the duty of putting the United States into an armour and an attitude demanded by the crisis, and corresponding with the national spirit and expectations.

"I recommend, accordingly, that adequate provision be made for filling the ranks and prolonging the enlistments of the regular troops; for an auxiliary force, to be engaged for a more limited term; for the acceptance of volunteer corps, whose patriotic ardour may court a participation in urgent services; for detachments, as they may be wanted, of other portions of the militia; and for such a preparation of the great body, as will proportion its usefulness to its intrinsic capacities. Nor can the occasion fail to remind you of the importance of those military seminaries, which, in every event, will form a valuable and frugal part of our military establishment.

"The manufacture of cannon and small arms has proceeded with due success, and the stock and resources of all the necessary munitions are adequate to emergencies. It will not be inexpedient, however, for congress to authorise an enlargement of them.

"Your attention will, of course, be drawn to such provisions, on the subject of our naval force, as may be required for the services to which it may be best adapted. I submit to congress the seasonableness, also, of an authority to augment the stock of such materials as are imperishable in their nature, or may not at once be attainable.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. I.

1811.

"In contemplating the scenes which distinguish this momentous epoch, and estimating their claims to our attention, it is impossible to overlook those developing themselves among the great communities which occupy the southern portion of our own hemisphere, and extend into our neighbourhood. An enlarged philanthropy, and an enlightened forecast, concur in imposing on the national councils an obligation to take a deep interest in their destinies; to cherish reciprocal sentiments of good-will; to regard the progress of events; and not to be unprepared for whatever order of things may be ultimately established.

"Under another aspect of our situation, the early attention of congress will be due to the expediency of farther guards against evasions and infractions of our commercial laws. The practice of smuggling, which is odious every where, and particularly criminal in free governments, where, the laws being made by all for the good of all, a fraud is committed on every individual as well as on the state, attains its utmost guilt, when it blends, with a pursuit of ignominious gain, a treacherous subserviency, in the transgressors, to a foreign policy adverse to that of their own country. It is then that the virtuous indignation of the public should be enabled to manifest itself, through the regular animadversions of the most competent laws.

"To secure greater respect to our mercantile flag, and to the honest interest which it covers, it is expedient, also, that it be made punishable in our citizens to accept licences from foreign governments, for a trade unlawfully interdicted by them to other American citizens; or to trade under false colours or papers of any sort.

"A prohibition is equally called for against the acceptance, by our citizens, of special licences, to be used in a trade with the United States; and against the admission into particular ports of the United States, of vessels from foreign countries, authorised to trade with particular ports only.

"Although other subjects will press more immediately on your deliberations, a portion of them cannot but be well bestowed on the just and sound policy of securing to our manufactures the success they have attained, and are still attaining, in some degree, under the impulse of causes not permanent; and to our navigation, the fair extent of which it is at present abridged, by the unequal regulations of foreign governments.

"Besides the reasonableness of saving our manufacturers from sacrifices which a change of circumstances might bring on them, the national interest requires, that, with respect to such articles, at least, as belong to our defence and our primary wants, we should not be left in unnecessary dependence on external supplies. And whilst foreign governments adhere to the existing discriminations in their ports against our navigation, and an equality or lesser discrimination is enjoyed by their navigation in our ports, the effect cannot be mistaken, because it has been seriously felt by our shipping-interests; and in proportion as this takes place, the advantages of an independent conveyance of our products to foreign markets, and of a growing body of mariners, trained by their occupations for the service of their country in times of danger, must be diminished.

"The receipts into the treasury, during the year ending on the 30th of September last, have exceeded thirteen millions and a half of dollars; and have enabled us to defray the current expences, including the interest on the public debt, and to reimburse more than five millions of dollars of the principal, without recurring to the loan authorised by the act of the last session. The temporary loan obtained in the latter end of the year 1810, has also been reimbursed, and is not included in that amount.

"The decrease of revenue, arising from the situation of our commerce, and the extraordinary expences which have and may become necessary, must be taken into view, in making commensurate provisions for the ensuing year. And I recommend to your consideration the propriety of ensuring a sufficiency of annual revenue, at least to defray the ordinary expences of government, and to pay the interest on the public debt, including that on new loans which may be authorised.

"I cannot close this communication without expressing my deep sense of the crisis in which you are assembled, my confidence in a wise and honorable result to your deliberations, and assurances of the faithful zeal with which my co-operating duties will be discharged; invoking, at the same time, the blessing of heaven on our beloved country, and on all the means that may be employed in vindicating its rights and advancing its welfare."

(Signed) "JAMES MADISON.

"Washington, Nov. 5, 1811."

In taking a review of this speech, we find it labours with its own weight in order to throw a load of blame upon the British government. It begins with a complaint of the unfriendly conduct of Great Britain in refusing what the president was pleased to term their neutral rights. During the discussions of the plenipotentiaries of the two powers upon this point, the governments of England and the United States could not agree, as they referred in their respective arguments and appeals to different principles and different codes.

The speech next alludes to the affair of the Little Belt, and, according to the result of the trial, inculpates the British commander. It must be confessed, that America, in this respect, had offered all the satisfaction which could be ex jure required of her. She had given Captain Rodgers a trial in one of her admiralty-courts, and it is the peculiar nature of these courts, that being administered in every country alike, that is, on the law of nations and the public law of Europe, they have every where an acknowledged name, and even some portion of authority; and their judgments are deemed satisfactory and conclusive, till set aside in the same form and manner, and for their manifest and gross injustice, in some other admiralty-court. The president, therefore, as president of America, committed no injury in assigning the wrong-doing to the party designated by his own admiralty-courts, though, as before intimated, the evidence had all the appearance of corruption.

The president next congratulates his countrymen on the friendly footing of America with the northern powers, and then, recurring to the conduct of Great Britain, taxed with the daily commission of many hostile acts, calls upon America to put herself into the armour and attitude demanded by her circumstances.—The measures proposed are the four following:—1. That the army be recruited up to its war establishment.—2. That the enlistment of the regular troops be prolonged.—3. That an auxiliary force (i. e. an army of reserve) be raised for a limited term.—4. A supplemental militia.—5. That corps of volunteers be accepted.—6. Such a preparation of the great body of the American people as will render its utility in some degree proportionate to what it ought to be from its natural intrinsic capacity (i. e. the instruction of the peasantry in the use and exercise of arms.)

Of the voluminous documents which accompanied the president's speech to congress, we shall confine ourselves to a description of them.

Relative to the orders in council, Mr. Foster, in his letters of the 3d, 11th, 14th, and 16th July, 1810, to Mr. Monroe, the American minister, insisted that the Berlin and Milan decrees had not been effectually repealed, and that the regent could not therefore forego the just measures of retaliation which his majesty, in his defence, had found it necessary to have recourse to.

Mr. Monroe, in a reply to Mr. Foster, dated 23d July, considered that his government was bound to respect the solemn declaration of the French government, August 5th, 1810, that the decrees were repealed; argued, that they were repealed from the release of the New Orleans packet, the Grace, Anne, and other vessels; endeavoured to avoid the meaning Mr. Foster gave to the declaration made to the deputation from the Hanse Towns by Bonaparte (viz. that he, Bonaparte, had not pronounced the cessation of any one of his decrees in that declaration, which, on the contrary, was a confirmation of them all) and concluded by declaring the determination of his government to continue the non-intercourse act, unless the British orders were revoked.

Mr. Foster, in a letter of the 24th July, asked whether it was the determination of the president to rest satisfied with the partial repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, which Mr. Monroe believed to have taken place. To this no reply seemed to have been given. In a letter from Mr. Foster, dated 26th July, he shewed that Mr. Monroe had not, in his letter of the 23d July, adduced any satisfactory proof of the repeal of the obnoxious decree of France, and he urged afresh the injustice of the American government in persevering in their union with the French system to crush the commerce of Great Britain.

In a reply to this letter by Mr. Monroe, on the 1st. Oct. he did not bring forward any fresh evidence to shew that the Berlin and Milan decrees were repealed, and he seemed to evade the discussion.

In a note, dated 17th of Oct. from Mr. Monroe, he enclosed two letters from Mr. Russel, the American chargé d'affaires at Paris, stating, that the Berlin and Milan decrees had ceased to be executed, and a note from the Marquis Wellesley, dated on the 14th of August, to Mr. Smith, acknowledging the receipt of a letter to Mr. Foster, stating, that he had commenced his negociations with Mr. Monroe, relative to the orders in council.

Mr. Foster, in a letter, dated on the 22d of Oct. alluded to Mr. Russel's letters, announcing the liberation of four or five American vessels, captured and brought into French ports since the 1st of Nov.; and he added to Mr. Monroe, "I hope you will not think it extraordinary if I should contend, that the seizure of American ships by France since Nov. 1st, and the positive and unqualified declarations of the French government, are stronger proofs of the continued existence of the French decrees, and the bad faith of the ruler of France, than the restoration of five or six vessels, too palpably given up for fallacious purposes, or in testimony of his satisfaction at the attitude taken by America, is a proof of their revocation, or of his return to the principles of justice."

Mr. Monroe, in his reply, dated Oct. 29, to this letter, adverted to Mr. Russel's letters, and stated, that it might have been fairly presumed, that the new evidence afforded of the complete revocation of the French decrees, as far as they interfered with the commerce of the United States with the British dominions, would have been followed by an immediate repeal of the orders in council.

Mr. Foster, in his reply, dated Oct. 31, insisted again, that, "where proof can be obtained of the decrees being in existence, we have it, namely,

BOOK XI. in the ports of France, in which vessels have been avowedly seized under their operation since November 1."

CHAP. I.

1811.

Mr. Foster, in his correspondence on the subject of the President and Little Belt, demanded the immediate disavowal of the act of aggression committed by the President, and required a just reparation.

Mr. Monroe stated, that no orders of a hostile nature had been given to Commodore Rodgers.

Mr. Monroe subsequently transmitted the result of the court of inquiry on Commodore Rodgers.

Mr. Foster replied, that he should transmit it to his government without delay.

Mr. Foster, in a letter of the 2d July, protested against the occupation of West Florida by the United States. Mr. Monroe, in his reply, dated on the 8th, argued that the province formed part of Louisiana, which was ceded to France, and bought of France by the United States. Mr. Foster, on the 5th of September, called upon the American government to explain the conduct of Governor Matthews, in attempting to subvert the Spanish authority in East Florida.

Mr. Monroe replied, that Spain had committed spoliations on American commerce, and that America looked to East Florida to indemnify her for them.

On the 12th of November, in the house of representatives, Mr. Smilie said, that it was high time the president's message should be taken into consideration. He therefore moved, "that the house resolve itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, for the purpose of taking it up." The house accordingly went into committee of the whole, Mr. Bibb in the chair.

Mr. Smilie then offered the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That so much of the president's message as relates to our foreign relations, be referred to a select committee.

2. Resolved, That so much of the president's message as relates to the measures of public defence demanded by the present crisis, be referred to a select committee.

3. Resolved, That so much of the president's message as relates to the revenue, and to the provisions necessary for the ensuing year, be referred to the committee of ways and means.

4. Resolved, That so much of the president's message as relates to evasions and infractions of the non-intercourse law, be referred to the committee of commerce and manufactures.

5. Resolved, That so much of the president's message as relates to foreign licences, and to the protection of manufactures and navigation, be referred to the committee of commerce and manufactures.

6. Resolved, That so much of the president's message as relates to the Spanish American colonies, be referred to a select committee.

Mr. Dawson thought the second resolution embraced too much. He wished to know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Smilie) intended to place every subject connected with military and naval defence before one committee.

Mr. Smilie said he did. All those subjects had been before one committee during the revolutionary war.

After some debate, the resolutions were agreed to, and the committee rose and reported them. After the committee rose,

Mr. D. R. Williams moved to amend the 2d resolution, so as to refer that part of the president's message relative to filling up the ranks, prolonging the enlistment of regular troops, and an auxiliary force, to a select committee.—Agreed to.

Mr. Bibb moved farther to amend the resolution, so as to embrace the subject of the militia generally.

Mr. Dawson proposed the following additional resolution, which was adopted:—

Resolved, That those parts of the president's message relative to the naval force, and to the defence of our maritime frontiers, be referred to a select committee.

The two following resolutions were also offered by Mr. Bacon, and adopted:—

Resolved, That so much of the president's message as relates to the manufacture of cannon and small arms, and providing munitions of war, be referred to a select committee.

Resolved, That so much of the president's message as relates to Indian affairs, be referred to a select committee.

Besides the affair of the President, an attack had been made upon the Chesapeake, an American frigate, in order to recover some British seamen illegally detained. (See Book VII. Chap. IX. page 561.) This affair was settled by a very just and noble submission on the part of Great Britain, which detracted nothing from her honor, whilst it added infinitely to the credit of her honesty; and the following was a consequent message to the senate and house of representatives of the United States, Nov. 16.

"I communicate to congress copies of a correspondence between the envoy-extraordinary and minister-plenipotentiary of Great Britain and the secretary of state relative to the aggression committed by a British ship of war on the United States frigate Chesapeake; by which it will be seen, that that subject of difference between the two countries is terminated by an offer of reparation, which has been acceded to.

"JAMES MADISON.

"Washington, Nov. 13, 1811."

The following was the correspondence alluded to.

Mr. Foster to Mr. Monroe.

Washington, Oct. 30.

"SIR,—I had already the honor to mention to you, that I came to this country furnished with instructions from his royal highness the prince-regent, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, for the purpose of proceeding to a final adjustment of the differences which have arisen between Great Britain and the United States of America in the affair of the Chesapeake frigate; and I had also that of acquainting you with the necessity under which I found myself of suspending the execution of those instructions, in consequence of not having perceived that any steps whatever were taken by the American government to clear up the circumstances of an event which threatened so materially to interrupt the harmony subsisting between our two countries, as that which occurred in the month of last May, between the United States ship President, and his majesty's ship Little Belt, when every evidence before his majesty's government seemed to shew that a most evident and wanton outrage had been committed on a British sloop of war by an American commodore.

"A court of inquiry, however, as you informed me in your letter of the 11th instant, has since been held by order of the president of the United States, on the conduct of Commodore Rodgers; and this preliminary to farther discussion on the subject being all that I asked in the first instance, as due to the friendship between the two states, I have now the honor to acquaint you that I am ready to proceed, in the truest spirit of conciliation, to lay before you the terms of reparation which his royal highness has commanded me to propose to the United States' government, and only wait to know when it will suit your convenience to enter upon the discussion. "AUG. J. FOSTER.
"The Hon. James Monroe, S. S."

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Foster.

Department of State, Oct. 31, 1811.

"SIR,—I have just had the honor to receive your letter of the 30th of this month.

"I am glad to find that the communication which I had the honor to make to you on the 11th instant, relative to the court of inquiry, which was the subject of it, is viewed by you in the favorable light which you have stated.

"Although I regret that the proposition which you now make in consequence of that communication, has been delayed to the present moment, I am ready to receive the terms of it whenever you may think proper to communicate them. Permit me to add, that the pleasure of finding them satisfactory will be duly augmented, if they should be introductory to a removal of all the differences depending between our two countries, the hope of which is so little encouraged by your past correspondence. A prospect of such a result will be embraced, on my part, with a spirit of conciliation equal to that which has been expressed by you.

61.

(Signed) "JAMES MONROE.

"A. J. Foster Esq. &c."

Mr. Foster to Mr. Monroe.

Washington, Nov. 1, 1811.

"SIR,—In pursuance of the orders which I have received from his royal highness the prince-regent, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, for the purpose of proceeding to a final adjustment of the differences which have arisen between Great Britain and the United States in the affair of the Chesapeake frigate, I have the honor to acquaint you—First, that I am instructed to repeat to the American government the prompt disavowal made by his majesty (and recited in Mr. Erskine's note of April 17, 1809, to Mr. Smith,) on being apprised of the unauthorised act of the officer in command of his naval forces on the coast of America, whose recall from an highly important and honorable command immediately ensued as a mark of his majesty's disapprobation.

"Secondly, that I am authorised to offer, in addition to that disavowal, on the part of his royal highness, the immediate restoration, as far as circumstances will admit, of the men who, in consequence of Admiral Berkeley's orders, were forcibly taken out of the Chesapeake, to the vessel from which they were taken; or, if that ship should be no longer in commission, to such seaport of the United States as the American government may name for the purpose.

"Thirdly, that I am also authorised to offer to the American government a suitable pecuniary provision for the sufferers in consequence of the attack on the Chesapeake, including the families of those seamen who unfortunately fell in the action, and of the wounded survivors.

"These honorable propositions, I can assure you, Sir, are made with the sincere desire that they may prove satisfactory to the United States; and I trust they will meet with the amicable reception which their conciliatory nature entitles them to. I need scarcely add how cordially I join with you in the wish that they might prove introductory to a removal of all the differences depending between our two countries.

"AUG. J. FOSTER

"To the Hon. James Monroe, &c."

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Foster.

Washington, Nov. 12, 1811.

"SIR,—I have had the honor to receive your

10 R

BOOK XI.

CHAP. I.

1811.

BOOK XI. letter of the 1st Nov. and to lay it before the president.

CHAP. I.
1811.

"It is much to be regretted that the reparation due for such an aggression as that committed on the United States frigate the Chesapeake, should have been so long delayed; nor could the translation of the offending officer from one command to another, be regarded as constituting a part of a reparation otherwise satisfactory: considering, however, the existing circumstances of the case, and the early and amicable attention paid to it by his royal highness the prince-regent, the president accedes to the proposition contained in your letters; and in so doing, your government will, I am persuaded, see a proof of the conciliatory disposition by which the president has been actuated.

"The officer commanding the Chesapeake, now lying in the harbour of Boston, will be instructed to receive the men who are to be restored to that ship. I have the honor, &c. "JAMES MONROE."

Though the non-importation act was in force in the United States against the manufactures of Great Britain, yet they still found their way to America, by circuitous means. Amelia Island, which is situated not far from the mouth of the Mississippi, was the great entrepôt for British commodities; however, at this time it was so narrowly watched by the American gun-brigs, that very little business was done. But great quantities of British commodities were introduced into the United States, by the way of Canada; which commerce, from the extent of the frontier, it was impossible to prevent. Large consignments were sent out to Canada for this traffic.

To the measures adopted by Mr. Madison, Mr. Pickering was a formidable opponent: this gentleman had addressed the people of the United States in the following manner:

"Fellow citizens.—By cherishing and animating the prejudices of the people in favor of France, and exasperating their antipathies to England, the leaders rose to power; and by persevering in the same means, they retain it; now and then faintly intimating, in a whisper, that some of the emperor's decrees are not just; and a few, the better to conceal their subserviency, and gain to themselves the character of independence, will even venture, occasionally, to call him a tyrant; with which his imperial majesty will not be offended, while they continue to serve him. For the seizure and confiscation of American vessels under the Rambouillet decrees,—an act of such distinguished atrocity,—such a shameless violation of the most obvious rules of justice as demonstrate the emperor's utter contempt for the opinion of the world, as well as for the rulers of the American republic, Mr. Madison made the kindest apology imaginable. The property of our citizens (says he) was seized under a misapplication of the principles of reprisal, combined with a misconstruction of the laws of the United States! when Mr. Madison, perfectly acquainted with the nature and character of the seizure, knew it to be an act of sheer deliberate villainy; that the principle of reprisal had nothing to do with it; and that the law was so plain, as to be incapable of misconstruction in relation to this point. Besides, if the law had appeared in any respect uncertain and doubtful, there was an intelligent American minister on the spot to explain it, if a right understanding of it had been desired. But such an understanding, a correct construction of the law, was not desired. A glaringly false construction alone could furnish the emperor with his shameless pretence for the seizure. These considerations, with those exhibited in the preceding address, shew that it was impossible for Mr. Madison to "anticipate" or "expect" the restoration of the property. Why, then, did he hazard the making of such a declaration to congress? On the foundation-principle formerly mentioned, and repeated, with some illustrations, in this address,—the maintenance of the prejudices of the people in favor of France, as the essential means of maintaining in power the party of which he is, at least, the ostensible head. A full and faithful display of the nature and effects of the Rambouillet decree would naturally and necessarily have led him to detail the multitude of other acts of France, alike unjust, insulting, and injurious to the United States, and their citizens. This, if the people continued under the delusion in which he, with his predecessor, and their own coadjutors, had involved them, would have destroyed his popularity. If such a display by the president of the United States served to open the eyes of the people, they, thus made sensible of the deceptions which had been practised upon them by the same leaders, would have cast them off; and the cause of democracy might have been ruined. Such a display, therefore, of wholesome truths, by Mr. Madison was not to be expected. Besides, it would have contradicted the course, and been subversive of the predilections of his whole life, in relation to France. But there was also an immediate object which forbade such a display: it would have deprived him of all apology for accepting the declarations of a conditional and future, instead of an actual, repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees; and thereby have deprived him of a pretence for reviving the non-intercourse law against Great Britain. An adjustment of our differences with Great Britain must not take place. The rulers of republican France, by intrigues, by bribery, endeavoured to prevent any amicable treaty between the United States and Great Britain: any treaty, which, by enlarging and securing our own commerce, would also benefit hers, and thus pave the way for that return of good-will and confidence between the two nations, which should add to the prosperity of both; and when one was fortunately made (that of 1794), France omitted no means to defeat it. And when foiled in this attempt, and afterwards in the choice of a president (Mr. Adams, and not Mr. Jefferson, being elected), she let loose and gave greater scope to her piratical cruisers, 'to fleece us of our property (as Joel Barlow said, and he was then in Paris) to a sufficient degree to bring us to our feeling in the only nerve in which it was presumed our sensibility lay, which was our pecuniary interest.' By 'bringing us to our feeling,' Mr. Barlow meant inducing the submission of the government of the United States to France, like many of the powers of Europe, whose cases he cited as examples for us to follow. Fortunately the minds of the great majority of the American people at that time remained alive to national insults and injuries. Resistance took place, instead of the expected submission.

"The French government was brought to its senses, and abandoned its impudent pretensions and claims. How this high and honorable ground was lost to the United States may be the subject of future observation. That season of dignity, spirit, and independence passed away; and that of submission followed, with all the evils we now experience in its train.

"I have mentioned bribery as one of the means used by France to gain and establish an influence in the United States; and I have done it on the following grounds:—

1. "The notorious profligacy of the French government (to say nothing of what existed under its former monarchy), evidenced by its uniform conduct from an early period of the revolution. The official documents of our own government, under the hands of our envoys, Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry, attest that profligacy. Doubtless there are some persons who, to gain an important point, would offer a bribe, who would disdain to receive one. The government of France had no scruples of this sort. The directory, by their minister of corruption, Talleyrand, had the consummate baseness and impudence to demand of our envoys a douceur (in English, a bribe,) of 50,000*l.* sterling, upward of 220,000 dollars, for the pockets of four of them: the fifth director, Merlin, who had held the office of minister of justice, being paid by the owners of privateers—for being the minister of iniquity in directing the decisions of the prize-courts, condemning American vessels and their cargoes.) And this bribe they were informed was only the customary tribute in diplomatic affairs! And even this douceur was not to procure the acknowledgment of our envoys in the character of public ministers, but only permission for them to stay in Paris, where those insolent tyrants kept their court.

2. "The confidential friend and agent of Talleyrand in this business (whose information Talleyrand told Mr. Gerry was just, and might always be relied on), in addition to the douceur of 50,000*l.*, earnestly pressed for a loan to the French republic of many millions of dollars; to have made which would have been a violation of our duty as a neutral nation: and urged various other unwarrantable and insolent demands of the French government; enforcing them by threats of its vengeance on failure of their compliance. Our envoys remaining firm and invincible, the confidential agent said to them, 'Perhaps you believe that in returning and exposing to your countrymen the unreasonableness of the demands of this government, you will unite them in resistance to those demands; you are mistaken: you ought to know that the diplomatic skill of France, and the means she possesses in your country, are sufficient to enable her, with the aid of the French party in America, to throw the blame which will attend the rupture of the negotiations on the federalists, as you term yourselves, but on the British party, as France terms you; and you may assure yourselves this will be done.'

3. "The testimony of Fauchet, the minister of France to the United States, in his famous letter of October 31, 1794, the time of the great insurrection in the western part of Pennsylvania, familiarly known by the name of the Whisky Insurrection, referring to certain overtures which had been made to him by one of the exclusive patriots, (whom he named) and which he had before communicated to his government, Fauchet says, 'Thus, with some thousands of dollars, the republic would have decided on civil war or peace! Thus the consciences of the pretended patriots of America have already their prices!'

4. "The notorious treachery of many officers, civil and military, of the countries which have been over-run by the arms of France, and whose treason can be ascribed to no cause but the distribution of French gold, or the delusive promises of elevation to higher employments and dignities, as in the case of Godoy, the prince of peace, who betrayed Spain into the hands of Bonaparte, or to both these causes. Accordingly, the opinion is general, that this sort of corruption has been the efficient pioneer to the French armies, and opened their way to conquest.

5. "The open avowal of the fact by a French agent, at the time that Adet (the successor of Fauchet) was the French minister in Philadelphia. This agent was Mr. Letoinbe, the consul-general of the French republic; a person well known to many of my fellow-citizens, as well as to me. Letombe had previously been French consul at Boston, had lived some years in the United States, and was doubtless much better informed concerning them than the minister Adet. Washington was then President of the United States: and probably Létombe perceived that the time had not arrived for France, by her intrigues and bribery, to give an effectual ascendancy in the councils of our nation. Letombe accordingly mentioned the fact in a tone of complaint and vexation. It was to a very intelligent and respectable gentleman of my acquaintance, to whom Letombe said, 'that Mr. Adet had foolishly thrown away a great deal of money in bribing members of congress, although they (Létombe and the minister) were put to much difficulty in raising it; and that they had, at a great loss to the French republic, in the negotiation, procured 80 or 90,000 dollars at Boston.' I quote from my memorandum, made at the time the information was given to me. Mr. Adet's mission to the United States terminated near the close of the year 1796. Since that time the French government has found less difficulty in procuring money. The plunder of the world, and the mines of Mexico and Peru have been open to them. Eighteen months ago I received satisfactory information, that the Frenchman who was then Bonaparte's consul-general in Philadelphia, had, in the course of one year, received about 1,000,000 of dollars, for which the French government could have no legitimate use in the United States; because it then neither derived nor needed any supplies from the United States.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. I.

1811.

"The evidences of corruption, of falsehood, of hypocrisy, and deceit, in the men whose official or personal means and influence have for many years given a direction to the public sentiment, and managed the affairs of the United States, it has been necessary to exhibit to the view of my fellow-citizens; because the only hope of political salvation rested on the public conviction, that those men did not deserve the confidence of the nation. This exposure was anticipated with regret; because (as I early remarked) in exposing them I should unavoidably expose the nakedness of my country; when, if compatible with truth, I would infinitely rather speak the praises of both. More remains to be told.

"July 29.

"TIMOTHY PICKERING."

CHAPTER II.

Hostile Determinations of America.—The intended War unpopular.—American Bill for Importation of Goods from Great Britain.—Bill for protecting British Seamen.—Pacific Disposition of the British Government.—Madison's Message to Congress.—Petitions against the Orders in Council.—Official Note on the said Orders.—Captain Henry's Mission to the United States.

THE American government evinced a hostile disposition towards Great Britain in the earliest proceedings of congress. On the 6th of December, when Mr. Porter called up the consideration of the report of the committee of foreign relations, he briefly stated "The objects and views which had governed the committee in their report, which he had submitted to the House. The orders in council were of themselves a sufficient cause of war with the committee; and which causes were aggravated by the miserable shifts of the British ministry, and their authority in that country. Any man not wilfully blind, could see that Britain had not acted towards them even in a manner which accorded with her own ideas of justice; she captured under a principle this week, which she did not avow the next; and if a doctrine so monstrous were sanctioned, she would next trample upon the necks of their citizens in the streets. It was the unanimous opinion of the Committee, that these encroachments were such as to demand war, as the only alternative to obtain justice. Their situation was like a young man establishing himself in society, who, if he submitted to indignities in the outset, would have to incur a double expence of time and labour to establish his lost character. On the carrying trade, the committee expressed no final opinion. It was in their power to harass the resources of Britain, as well on the ocean as by land; to carry on a war against her coast and colonies at their own doors; and destroy her trade with the colonies, by the number of privateers which would be fitted out for service. They had it in their power to make a conquest of Canada, which, to Britain, was of the utmost importance; and from whence she had imported articles of the utmost necessity last year, to the amount of 600,000,000 dollars, a great deal of which was for square timber for her navy. They held a sword over her resources which would cut her to the quick. It was, therefore, the determination of the committee to RECOMMEND open war to the utmost energies of the nation; yet he hoped it would not be entered into prematurely, for the howlings of newspapers. He knew that many of his friends were for immediate war; he felt the indignities of their situation as sensibly as any man in the house, and he would go as far to redress them, when the preliminaries were settled; but he did not wish to invite to the feast till the cloth was laid—till the nation was 'put into the attitude, and a war demanded by the crisis.'"

The resolutions were all carried in a committee of the whole, except the second, in which the words "ten thousand" were struck out, with a view to insert a larger number, which there appeared to be some difficulty in fixing on; the lowest proposition was 12,000, and the highest not exceeding 50,000; it was, however, agreed to let it remain, so that when the bill was reported, the house could fill as they saw proper; more time would elapse, and they would be better informed on the subject. (10,000 was an idea quite out of order to mention; they were quite up to the war mark.)

The resolutions were afterwards taken up in the house, and the first carried by Ayes and Noes, 117 to 11.

The second resolution was then proposed by the speaker.—A plea for time was put in by Mr. Randolph and Mr. Goldsborough, who said, "if they were to be dragged into a war, it was but reasonable to give them one night more to reflect on it." The house then adjourned till the 7th, at eleven, when it sat but a very little time, and adjourned on the motion of Mr. Randolph, as the committee of investigation wished to have this day for the examination of persons agreeably to their powers: unless time was given, as the duty was arduous, it would be putting a veto on their proceedings.

The house of representatives determined to recognize formally the independence of South America.

Though the president's enmity against Great Britain was supported by congress, the intended war was far from being popular in the United States: the clamour for it subsided rapidly; petitions were presented against it, and on the 7th of January, 1812, Mr. Newton observed, "that the committee of commerce and manufactures had been for some time hesitating what report to make on the various petitions of merchants praying permission to import British goods purchased previously to the 2d of February last. The delay of the committee had been owing to a wish to ascertain the course that congress would pursue: and as the national legislature had determined to assume a manly attitude with regard to Great Britain, the committee, (he said,) had instructed him to report a bill for the relief of the petitioners." Mr. N. accordingly reported a bill, authorising the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandize, under certain circumstances, from Great Britain, her colonies, and dependencies.—The bill was referred to a committee of the whole, of which the following is a copy:

"A bill to authorise the importation of goods, wares, and merchandize, under certain circumstances, from Great Britain, her colonies, or dependencies.

"Sect. 1. Be it enacted, by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, that all goods, wares, and merchandize, being the growth, produce, and manufacture of Great Britain, her colonies, or dependencies, which were purchased or actually contracted for in Great Britain, her colonies, or dependencies, anterior to the 1st day of February, 1811, shall be, and the same is hereby authorised to be, imported into the United States, or the territories thereof, and may be admitted to entry, provided the satisfactory proof be exhibited conformable to such regulations and instructions as shall, from time to time, be given by the secretary of the treasury to the respective collectors of the customs, that the goods, wares, and merchandize imported into the United States or the territories thereof, by virtue of this act, were purchased or actually contracted for anterior to the 1st of February, 1811, and that such goods, wares, or merchandize are the bona fide property of a citizen or citizens of the United States, or the territories thereof.

"Sect. 2. And be it farther enacted, that the following addition be inserted after the passage of this act, to the oath or affirmation taken by importers, consignees, or agents, at the time of entering goods imported into the United States, or the territories thereof, viz:—'I do also swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, amongst the goods, wares, or merchandize now offered to be entered, any goods, wares, or merchandize other than such as are permitted by virtue of the provisions of this act to be imported into the United States, or the territories thereof; and I do farther swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover any such goods, wares, or merchandize, amongst the said goods, wares, and merchandize imported in manner and form aforesaid, I will immediately, and without delay, report the same to the collector of this district.'

"Sect. 3. And be it farther enacted, that the following additions shall be inserted after the passage of this act to the oath or affirmation taken by the masters or persons having the charge or command of any ship or vessel arriving at any port within the United States, or the territories thereof, to wit:—'I further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on-board (the denomination and name of BOOK XI. the vessel) any goods, wares, or merchandize, but such as are authorised by the provisions of this act to be imported into the United States or the territories thereof; and I do farther swear, (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandize on-board said vessel, or which shall have been imported in the same, I will immediately and without delay make report thereof to the collector of the port of this district.'

CHAP. II.

1812.

"Sec. 4. And be it farther enacted, That if any person or persons shall falsely make oath or affirmation to any of the matters herein required to be verified, such person or persons shall suffer the like pains and penalties as shall be incurred by persons committing wilful and corrupt perjury."

A bill of a most extraordinary nature was also brought forward in the house of representatives in America, for the purpose, as it was termed, of protecting American seamen. It was read a first and second time, and committed. The principal provisions were, that if any foreigner should be guilty of impressing any American citizen on-board of a foreign ship or vessel, if he should be arrested, he should be tried and convicted as a pirate, and suffer death; and the American so-impressed, on his return to his country, should be entitled to thirty dollars per month during the time of his detention, and might recover it by a suit of foreign attachment, against the debtor of any British creditor; and what he should recover, and the costs, should be so much payment of the debt.

The proceedings of the imperial parliament fully demonstrated the pacific disposition of the British government towards the United States. The subject was introduced by Mr. Whitbread, Feb. 13, who said "All parties profess that they deprecate the idea of a war with America—all parties profess that such an event is but too probable. Those who conducted the affairs of America and of this country had uniformly declared, that each was actuated by the most conciliatory dispositions; it had, however, unfortunately turned out, that, notwithstanding this most friendly disposition on our side, the breach had widened from day to day. It might be seen from the speech of the president, that war was the inevitable consequence of the pernicious system which Great Britain had adopted. The case was before the world, with the exception of the two houses of parliament of the British empire; every one who read the papers knew the case, but the British parliament knew it not. The great question which they had to decide was, whether they should or should not go to war with America? and unless information was officially and technically communicated to the house, which might be referred to as documents on the table, they could not form any decision. If the markets of the western world were open to our trade, innumerable would be the blessings which would ensue to this country; but, if a war with America was resolved on, the greatest evils must be expected. It was very well in us to talk of chastising America, of crushing and annihilating her; but, in his opinion, our greatest efforts could not accomplish the one or the other.—The news which had lately arrived made it important that the house should be in the possession of every information. The effects of the bill now agitated in congress would, if passed, give great umbrage to France, after what had occurred in the course of their negotiations; he therefore thought that we should watch for and seize this opportunity of amicably adjusting the differences. He concluded by moving

"That an humble address be presented to his royal-highness the prince-regent, that he will be pleased to direct, that there be laid before the house copies of the correspondence between the secretary of state for foreign affairs, and the American charge d'affaires, from Jan. 1, 1810, to the latest period; together with copies of the correspondence between Mr. Foster and Mr. Monroe, and of the documents referred to therein."

Mr. Stephen said, considering as he did the importance of the question, he would content himself with saying, generally, that never was there any thing more unfounded than the assertion, that the conduct of this country to America was unjust. Nothing but a wish to conciliate, could justify his majesty's ministers in the persevering and almost humiliating line of conduct which they had adopted, for the purpose of avoiding a rupture with America. The question was not, whether we were to go to war with America, but whether America was to go to war with us?

Mr. Curwen said, the state of the country called seriously on ministers to retrace their steps. America had a right to dispose of her commerce as she pleased, and no country should have the power to call that right in question. Whatever might be the pertinacity of the chancellor of the exchequer on this head, he sincerely hoped that he would not be long in a situation to retain it with any effect.—(At this time a change in ministry was expected.)

The chancellor of the exchequer would maintain that the language of the British government, with respect to conciliation, had been always sincere, while at the same time it was anxious not to give up rights, which, if great Britain relinquished, would degrade her from the rank which she held among the nations of the world. With the remark that the prosperity of America was that of Great Britain, he perfectly agreed. (Hear!) A decided common advantage would be obtained by peace, and lost by a state of war, and, as far as was consistent with the rights of Great Britain, should be preserved. It was impossible, however, to consent to the production of the papers without seeing many points into which it might be inexpedient to enter. An honorable gentleman had expressed a hope that this negotiation might soon be in other hands; but he was inclined to believe that the honorable gentleman's consolatory views would not open upon him so soon as he imagined; nor if the conduct recommended by that honorable gentleman should be adopted should he wish to be the minister who was to carry it into execution.

Mr. Baring was apprehensive that, from the feelings of the country, a war could hardly be avoided. If discussions were actually pending betwixt the two governments, the production of the papers might be inexpedient.

Mr. Hutchinson said, if he were called on to give his vote on the differences between this country and America, he should give his vote for America, and against his own country. He had no confidence in ministers.—(A laugh.)—He had no confidence in the plunderers of America, and the authors of the accursed cry of “no popery.” They did not merit the confidence of parliament, nor the confidence of the country.

Mr. Lester contended, that ministers carried on affairs well, and were entitled to the gratitude of the country.

The house divided—for the motion, 36.—Against it, 123.—Majority against the motion, 87.

Mr. Lockhart made a motion respecting the claims of the American loyalists, and went into some statements respecting their origin and nature. They complained that they were injured by government taking a sum nearly one-third less than what would provide a just compensation for their losses, and the object of his motion was, that a committee should be appointed, to whom the petition of these claimants might be referred, who should examine into these claims, and report upon them.

The chancellor of the exchequer said, that the question would be found to resolve itself into this, that government having done all it could to enforce these claims without actually going to war about them, and having obtained from the American government all it could obtain, whether it was now bound to make good a deficiency to so great an amount as was claimed. He apprehended the petitioners had no right to expect compensation from that house for what was due to them from the American government.—Leave was given to appoint the committee.

On the 19th of March, the president, Mr. Madison, sent the following message to both houses of congress, to the senate and house of representatives.

“I lay before congress copies of certain documents which remain in the department of state; they prove, that at a recent period, whilst the United States, notwithstanding the wrongs sustained by them, cease not to observe the laws of peace and neutrality towards Great Britain, and in the midst of amicable professions and negotiations on the part of the British government there, and its public minister here, a secret agent of that government was employed in certain states, more especially at the seat of government, Massachusetts, in fomenting dissaffection to the constituted authorities of the nation, and in intrigue with the disaffected, for the purpose of bringing about resistance to the laws, and eventually in concert with a British force destroying the union, and forming the eastern part thereof into a political connection with Great Britain: in addition to the effect which the discovery of such a procedure ought to have on the public councils, it will not fail to render more dear to the hearts of all good citizens that happy union of the states, which, under Divine Providence, is the guarantee of our liberties, their safety, their tranquillity, and their prosperity.

(Signed) “JAMES MADISON”
“March 19, 1812.”

This message was accompanied with several documents upon which it was founded. They contained the correspondence of the Earl of Liverpool and Sir James Craig, late governor of Canada, with a certain Captain John Henry, who was the secret agent spoken of, and who had himself made the disclosure to the government, and given them the document, alleging, as the reason, that the British government had refused to give him his reward. The documents were transmitted by Mr. Henry to Mr. Monroe, the American secretary, in a letter, dated Philadelphia, 20th of Feb. 1812, in which he said, that his great object in making the disclosure, was to produce unanimity among all parties in America.

No. 2. contained the general instructions from Sir James Craig to Mr. Henry, dated on the 6th of Feb. 1809, respecting his secret mission. The following was the most material part of them:—

“It has been supposed, that if the federalists of the eastern states should be successful in obtaining that decided influence which may enable them to direct the public opinion, it is not improbable, that rather than submit to a continuance of the difficulties and distress to which they are now subject, they will exert that influence to bring about a separation from the general union. The earliest information on this subject may be of great consequence to our government, as it may also be, that it should be informed how far, in such an event, they would look up to England for assistance, or be disposed to enter into a connection with us.

“Although it would be highly inexpedient that you should, in any manner, appear as an avowed agent, yet if you could contrive to obtain an intimacy with any of the leading party, it may not be improper that you should insinuate, though with great caution, that if they should wish to enter into any communication with our government through me, you are authorised to receive any such, and will safely transmit it to me."

BOOK XI.

CHAP. II.

1812.

No. 6. contained Mr. Henry's memorial to Lord Liverpool, enclosed in a letter to Mr. Peel, dated June 13, 1811:—In this memorial he alluded to the object of his mission, which "Was to promote and encourage the federal party to resist the measures of the general government: to offer assurances of aid and support from his majesty's government of Canada: and to open a communication between the leading men engaged in that opposition and the governor-general, upon such a footing as circumstances might suggest; and, finally, to render the plans then in contemplation subservient to the views of his majesty's government.

"The undersigned undertook the mission which lasted from the month of January to the month of June inclusive, during which period those public acts and legislative resolutions of the assemblies of Massachusetts and Connecticut were passed, which kept the general government of the United States in check, and deterred it from carrying into execution the measures of hostility with which Great Britain was menaced."

The memorial concluded with saying, that "the appointment of judge-advocate-general of the province of Lower Canada, with a salary of 500*l.* a-year, or a consulate in the United States, sine curia, would be considered by him as a liberal discharge of any obligation that his majesty's government may entertain in relation to his services."

Then followed some letters from Mr. Ryland, secretary to Sir James Craig, to Mr. Henry, dated Quebec, May, 1809, requesting him to return to Quebec, Mr. Erskine's arrangement having rendered his mission no longer necessary.

Several petitions from Birmingham having been presented to the house of commons, against the orders in council, a committee of the whole house was appointed to take them into consideration. The evidence was printed, of which the following is the substance.

Mr. Thomas Attwood, High-bailiff of Birmingham, was first examined. He stated,—“I am a banker in Birmingham, and connected with the iron trade. The population of Birmingham and the neighbouring manufacturing districts amounts to 400,000, of whom 50,000, at least, are employed in manufacturing iron, besides those who work in brass-foundries, buttons, jewellery, &c. Within these two years, trade has been in a deplorable state. Labourers, who twelve months ago could obtain twenty shillings a week, get now only ten or twelve shillings, and a great number of workmen are dismissed. Every manufacturer is overloaded with stock, and he cannot sell it at what it cost him. The principal trade of Birmingham is to America, but for the last twelve months there have been no exports to America. The value of the annual exports to America 800,000*l.* or 1,000,000*l.* During the last twelve months there has been a trifling export to Portugal, Spain, Malta, and South America, amounting to about 200,000*l.* or 300,000*l.* There has been recently at Birmingham a considerable extra employment in the manufacture of cast-iron pipes. This must have, during the last twelve months, amounted to nearly 100,000*l.* and had it not been for that resource, the situation of the trade must have been considerably worse. I am informed, that the Americans have erected steel furnaces, and are not likely to want any more steel from England. The manufacturers have, with great reluctance, dismissed many of their men. They have been accumulating stock for the last twelve months. They have thus exhausted the whole of their capital, partly from motives of interest, looking forward to markets opening to the trade, but principally from motives of honorable humanity. I have heard, that many orders have been received from America conditionally, on the repeal of the orders in council; but nails, and some other articles, have been omitted, on the ground of their being now manufactured in America.” The witness ascribed the decay of trade chiefly to the cessation of intercourse with the United States, and though he had heard that machinery had made considerable progress in America, he was of opinion, that their manufactures could not maintain a competition with the British if the markets were open. “Some manufactures which America used to be supplied with from England, are now sent from the continent. The transmission of our manufactures through the northern colonies has failed; and British manufactured goods can now be bought in Canada at less than prime cost.” The whole manufactures of Birmingham the witness estimated at about one million, and one half he supposed used to be exported to America. In answer to the question, what has been the conduct of the labouring manufacturers during the last twelve months? He answered, “the labouring mechanics of Birmingham, and I believe of the whole district, have been looking for the opening of the American intercourse, and have relied upon it, under the hope, that upon the expiration of the restrictions, the difficulties with the United States of America would be made up.” If the non-intercourse act continued to be enforced, the witness was of opinion, that it would create manufactures in America to such an extent, that it would, at last, become a part of the policy of the government of the United States to protect them, by preventing the importation of British manufactures. He believed very little of the Birmingham hardwares go to the West Indies, perhaps not above 100,000*l.* annually.

William Whitehouse, nail-monger, of West Bromwich, in Staffordshire, about six miles from Birmingham, stated, that the depression in trade commenced about August, 1810, and that it had been growing continually worse since that date. The nail manufactory in his district, when in a flourishing state, employed from 25 to 30,000 persons. The reduction of wages since August, 1810, has been from seven and a half to ten per cent. Since February, 1811, the witness had exported only one lot of goods to America. In the manufactory with which the witness was connected, the hands had been reduced from 1,200 pair to 500 pair. There are considerable orders in the country, to be executed immediately on the intercourse with America being opened. The witness considered the exports to South America increasing trade. About one-fourth of the nails manufactured, he supposed, are exported to North America.

T. Potts, a merchant, residing at Birmingham, being examined, stated, that he had been in business sixteen or eighteen years. Had some knowledge of the nail trade in Birmingham. The wages in this business are so low, that a man can scarcely exist. A rise had taken place, in the expectation of opening the trade with America, but that expectation had been disappointed. Men in the button and plated lines, who would formerly earn from forty to fifty shillings a week, do not now get half those wages. In the town of Birmingham there were from 20 to 25,000 labouring men out of employ. The whole town is different from what it used to be, there is a deficiency in every trade. Distresses are universal. "I think, in the course of two months, that necessity will oblige the merchants to dismiss at least two parts of their men out of three." Witness exported Birmingham manufactures to America: the export was worse than ever. Their goods cannot be shipped from Liverpool: they will not be received in the United States. The shipments began to fall off in 1808; there was no falling off in 1807. "The trade had been uniformly increasing, and we could always anticipate what would suit the market before the orders came, and that enabled us to keep the lower orders in the vicinity of the town constantly employed. The Americans were once considered bad payers, but they have improved progressively every year." Witness had done no business with America since 1811. The attempt to smuggle goods to the United States had been attended by painful results. Goods at Quebec, from Manchester and Birmingham, were cheaper than at the manufacturing towns. The value of the export from Birmingham, previous to the distresses, was about a million: did not know whether it fell in 1809. Men had emigrated from Birmingham to America.

Joseph Shaw, chairman of the chamber of Foreign commerce of Birmingham, stated, that the hardware export trade to Europe, Turkey, and South America, had decreased since 1807. The trade to the continent had decreased since the orders in council, and was now almost at an end.

James Ryland, a plater of coach-harness, &c. stated, that his business had greatly declined by the American markets being closed.

Richard Spooner, banker, of Birmingham, corroborated the preceding statements respecting the falling off of the trade, and the distresses of the workmen. The increase on their poor-rates in eight years, amounted to 4,500*l.*

William Blakeway, a lamp maker, employed sixty pair of hands at Birmingham. He stated that the trade of his article had fallen off, and the greater part of his stock remained on his hands, the American market being shut—should be obliged to turn off his hands if confined to the home trade of this country.

Several other witnesses from Manchester, Spitalfields, &c. deposed to the same effect.

The following was the prince-regent's declaration respecting the Berlin and Milan decrees, and the orders in council, which was not founded on any document officially communicated from the French government, but on a message which Bonaparte sent to the conservative senate.

"The government of France, having by an official report, communicated by its minister for foreign affairs to the conservative senate, on the 10th day of March last, removed all doubts as to the perseverance of that government in the assertion of principles, and in the maintenance of a system, not more hostile to the maritime rights and commercial interests of the British empire, than inconsistent with the rights and independence of neutral nations; and having thereby plainly developed the inordinate pretensions which that system as promulgated in the decrees of Berlin and Milan, was from the first designed to enforce; his royal highness the prince-regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, deems it proper, upon this formal and authentic republication of the principles of those decrees, thus publicly to declare his royal highness's determination still firmly to resist the introduction and establishment of this arbitrary code, which the government of France openly avows its purpose to impose by force upon the world as the law of nations.

"From the time that the progressive injustice and violence of the French government made it impossible for his majesty any longer to restrain the exercise of the rights of war within their ordinary limits, without submitting to consequences not less ruinous to the commerce of his dominions, than derogatory to the rights of his crown, his majesty has endeavoured, by a restricted and moderate use of those rights of retaliation, which the Berlin and Milan decrees necessarily called into action, to reconcile neutral states to those measures which the conduct of the enemy had rendered unavoidable; and which his majesty has at all times professed his readiness to revoke, so soon as the decrees of the enemy, which gave occasion to them, should be formally and unconditionally repealed, and the commerce of neutral nations be restored to its accustomed course.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. II.

1812.

"At a subsequent period of the war, his majesty, availing himself of the then situation of Europe, without abandoning the principle and object of the orders in council of November, 1807, was induced so to limit their operation, as materially to alleviate the restrictions thereby imposed upon neutral commerce. The order in council of April, 1809, was substituted in the room of those of November, 1807, and the retaliatory system of Great Britain acted no longer on every country in which the aggressive measures of the enemy were in force, but was confined in its operation to France, and to the countries upon which the French yoke was most strictly imposed; and which had become virtually a part of the dominions of France.

"The United States of America remained nevertheless dissatisfied; and their dissatisfaction has been greatly increased by an artifice too successfully employed on the part of the enemy, who has pretended, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan were repealed, although the decree effecting such repeal has never been promulgated; although the notification of such pretended repeal distinctly described it to be dependent on conditions, in which the enemy knew Great Britain could never acquiesce; and although abundant evidence has since appeared of their subsequent execution.

"But the enemy has at length laid aside all dissimulation; he now publicly and solemnly declares, not only that those decrees still continue in force, but that they shall be rigidly executed until Great Britain shall comply with additional conditions, equally extravagant; and he further announces the penalties of those decrees to be in full force against all nations which shall suffer their flag to be, as it is termed in this new code, 'denationalized.'

"In addition to the disavowal of the blockade of May, 1806, and of the principles on which that blockade was established, and in addition to the repeal of the British orders in council—he demands an admission of the principles, that the goods of an enemy, carried under a neutral flag, shall be treated as neutral;—that neutral property, under the flag of an enemy, shall be treated as hostile;—that arms and warlike stores alone (to the exclusion of ship timber and other articles of naval equipment) shall be regarded as contraband of war;—and that no ports shall be considered as lawfully blockaded, except such as are invested and besieged, in the presumption of their being taken, (en prevention d'être pris), and into which a merchant ship cannot enter without danger.

"By these and other demands, the enemy in fact requires, that Great Britain, and all civilized nations, shall renounce, at his arbitrary pleasure, the ordinary and indisputable rights of maritime war: that Great Britain, in particular, shall forego the advantages of her naval superiority, and allow the commercial property, as well as the produce and manufactures of France, and her confederates, to pass the ocean in security, whilst the subjects of Great Britain are to be in effect proscribed from all commercial intercourse with other nations; and the produce and manufactures of these realms are to be excluded from every country in the world, to which the arms or the influence of the enemy can extend.

"Such are the demands to which the British government is summoned to submit,—to the abandonment of its most ancient, essential, and undoubted maritime rights. Such is the code by which France hopes, under the cover of a neutral flag, to render her commerce unassailable by sea; whilst she proceeds to invade or to incorporate with her own dominions all states that hesitate to sacrifice their national interests at her command, and, in abdication of their just rights, to adopt a code, by which they are required to exclude, under the mask of municipal regulation, whatever is British from their dominions.

"The pretext for these extravagant demands is, that some of these principles were adopted by voluntary compact in the treaty of Utrecht; as if a treaty once existing between two particular countries, founded on special and reciprocal considerations, binding only on the contracting parties, and which in the last treaty of peace between the same powers had not been revived, were to be regarded as declaratory of the public law of nations.

"It is needless for his royal highness to demonstrate the injustice of such pretensions. He might otherwise appeal to the practice of France herself, in this and in former wars; and to her own established codes of maritime law: it is sufficient that these new demands of the enemy form a wide departure from those conditions on which the alleged repeal of the French decrees was accepted by America; and upon which alone, erroneously assuming that repeal to be complete, America has claimed a revocation of the British orders in council.

"His royal highness, upon a review of all these circumstances, feels persuaded, that so soon as this formal declaration, by the government of France, of its unabated adherence to the principles and provisions of the Berlin and Milan decrees, shall be made known in America, the government of the United States, actuated not less by a sense of justice to Great Britain, than by what is due to its own dignity, will be disposed to recal those measures of hostile exclusion, which, under a misconception of the real views and conduct of the French government, America has exclusively applied to the commerce and ships of war of Great Britain.

"To accelerate a result so advantageous to the true interests of both countries, and so conducive to the re-establishment of perfect friendship between them; and to give a decisive proof of his royal highness's disposition to perform the engagements of his majesty's government, by revoking the orders in council whenever the French decrees shall be actually and unconditionally repealed; his royal highness the prince-regent has been this day pleased, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, and by and with the advice of his majesty's privy council, to order and declare:

"That if at any time hereafter the Berlin and Milan decrees shall, by some authentic act of the French government, publicly promulgated, be expressly and unconditionally repealed; then, and from thenceforth, the order in council of the 7th day of January, 1807, and the order in council of the 26th day of April, 1809, shall, without any further order, be, and the same hereby are declared from thenceforth to be wholly and absolutely revoked; and further, that the full benefit of this order shall be extended to any ship or vessel captured subsequent to such authentic act of repeal of the French decrees, although antecedent to such repeal such ship or vessel shall have commenced, and shall be in the prosecution of a voyage, which, under the said orders in council, or one of them, would have subjected her to capture and condemnation; and the claimant of any ship or cargo which shall be captured at any time subsequent to such authentic act of repeal by the French government, shall, without any further order or declaration on the part of his majesty's government on this subject, be at liberty to give in evidence in the high court of admiralty, or any court of vice-admiralty, before which such ship or vessel, or its cargo, shall be brought for adjudication, that such repeal by the French government had been by such authentic act promulgated prior to such capture; and upon proof thereof, the voyage shall be deemed and taken to have been as lawful, as if the said orders in council had never been made; saving, nevertheless, to the captors, such protection and indemnity as they may be equitably entitled to, in the judgement of the said court, by reason of their ignorance or uncertainty as to the repeal of the French decrees, or of the recognition of such repeal by his majesty's government, at the time of such capture.

"His royal highness, however, deems it proper to declare, that, should the repeal of the French decrees, thus anticipated and provided for, afterwards prove to have been illusory on the part of the enemy; and should the restrictions thereof be still practically enforced, or revived by the enemy, Great Britain will be obliged, however reluctantly, after reasonable notice to neutral powers, to have recourse to such measures of retaliation as may then appear to be just and necessary.

"Westminster, April 21, 1812."

Mr. Madison's complaint of Capt. Henry's mission to the United States became a subject of consideration in the house of lords, May 5, when Lord Holland, after some preliminary observations, moved for the communications from Sir James Craig, relative to the employment of Henry in a mission to the United States, and by reading two other motions, the one for the communications from the secretary of state to Sir George Prevost, respecting the claims for compensation made by Henry, and the other for the instructions sent by the secretary of state to Sir James Craig, relative to the employment of any person on a mission to the United States.

The Earl of Liverpool said, the government here never authorised the employment of Henry, nor did they know of his being employed on the mission alluded to, till long after the transaction was past. His lordship then entered into a detail of the circumstances attending the transaction. Henry, he stated, who had for some years resided in Canada, but who was, in 1808, in the United States, had of his own accord, in that year, opened a correspondence with the government of Canada, giving information of the state of parties and other matters, which was found useful—he subsequently returned to Canada. Towards the latter end of that year the commander-in-chief at Boston issued orders to the troops to be in readiness to march at an hour's notice. Congress also, in December, voted the raising of 50,000 volunteers. There was no doubt that the object of these hostile preparations was the attack of the British North America possessions, and when Mr. Erskine, either in the last day of December, 1808, or the 1st of January, 1809, very properly required an explanation of these hostile preparations, he was informed by Mr. Madison, that from the treatment experienced from both the belligerents, the government of the United States might consider itself as justified in commencing hostilities without further notice. Mr. Erskine, in consequence, very properly sent an express to Sir James Craig, informing him of these circumstances, and that there was no doubt of its being the intention of the American government to attack the British North American possessions; and Sir J. Craig had actually sent an express to Sir G. Prevost, at Halifax, to suspend, in consequence, his sailing on an expedition to Martinique. It was under these circumstances of threatened hostility that Sir James Craig employed Henry. There were several interpolations in the papers as published, but he admitted the instructions of Sir J. Craig to be genuine. These instructions, however, had, he contended, been misinterpreted, the object was not to excite discontents, but to obtain information of the state of the discontents in America, with a view to the use that might be made of them in the event of hostilities, which were then expected almost immediately to commence. It was in this expectation of hostilities that the instructions were issued, and that there was no intention of applying them to a period of peace, was evident from Henry being recalled by Sir James Craig, when the arrangement with Mr. Erskine took place. He thought it right also to state, that in April, 1809, the most positive instructions were sent from this country not to employ any person in the United States on any mission which could excite irritation. He could not find any farther documents respecting Henry until last year, when this man applied for a compensation. He found, on reference to Mr. Ryland, that Henry had been employed as he stated, and had been promised by Sir James Craig an employment in Canada. Several most respectable houses in the Canada trade also had recommended him in the warmest terms; and it was under these circumstances that he had recommended him to Sir George Prevost, to be appointed to some employment. He saw no necessity for the noble lord's motion. Surely they were entitled to expect that the government of the United States, before making such a communication to congress, would have communicated with our minister there, or with their minister here, in order to have the transactions of which they complained explained; and he trusted their lordships would give his majesty's ministers credit for not delaying to put the matter in a right course in the proper channel. Under these circumstances, he could not, consistently with his public duty, consent to the motion.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. II.

1812.

The house divided, when the numbers were—contents, twenty-seven;—non-contents, seventy-three.

CHAPTER III.

Death and Biographical Sketch of Horne Tooke.—A Key to the Orders in Council.

ABOUT this time the celebrated Horne Tooke died: this remarkable character having commenced his political career with the first American war, certainly demands the present attention of the reader; for, in the period in which he lived, and the sphere which he filled, no man was ever more active or conspicuous.

From the commencement of the reign of his present majesty, to the day of Horne Tooke's death, scarcely had any public occurrence passed in which he had not had a greater share than belonged to his mere private station. He had accordingly been the most active individual in a period of general activity. He had lived in more revolutions of politics and parties than any other man of the day, and in all of them his talents or his intrigue, his good or bad intentions, and his indefatigable spirit and exertions rendered him an actor.

Mr. Tooke was born in an humble station of life; his father is said to have been a poulterer. But as his father, who lived in some of the small streets about Westminster, had the spirit to send his son to a public school, and afterwards to a college, it is a reasonable conclusion either that he was richer than ordinary, or that he possessed a very superior mind to what usually belongs to his condition.

His father at any rate was sufficiently respectable to be the treasurer of a public charity. This was the Middlesex Hospital, of which Horne Tooke afterwards himself became one of the governors.

Mr. Tooke was sent to Westminster School at a very early age, and is said to have passed through all the forms of that distinguished seminary. This course of itself, in such a mind as that of Horne Tooke, was sufficient to render him the eminent scholar which he afterwards exhibited himself. It is the character of Westminster School, that it puts its pupils in the right way, and imbibes them with a right mind, and therefore they have only to follow in future life the plan which is there traced for them. This is all that any school can do, and it is more we believe than is done by the greater part of them.

To begin well is to ensure a good conclusion. It is related in a memoir of Horne Tooke, inserted in a work published some time since, that he was removed from Westminster to Eton at the usual age. This, however, must be a mistake, as Westminster and Eton are not in the relation of school and college to each other. It is possible that Horne Tooke might have had the advantage of both these eminent schools, but it is more probable that this is an error.

In the year 1754, he was sent to Cambridge, and entered himself of St. John's College. We do not know what was the reputation of this college at the time, but it is certainly a high honor to its name in literature that it has sent forth such a profound scholar as Horne Tooke.

He studied at college with the most exemplary industry, and he acquired the necessary fruit of such assiduity, an early proficiency in learning and philology.

Mr. H. Tooke was educated for the church, and his first prospects are said to have been very promising. He entered into holy orders at the usual age, and immediately obtained the living of Brentford. He had connections whose favor did not stop at this point. The Duke of Newcastle, we believe, from some kind of interest, took him into his patronage, and Horne Tooke obtained a promise, that he should be appointed one of the royal chaplains. Fortunately, however, (for such we must consider it) for the interests of religion, Mr. Horne's star here interposed.

The nation very shortly became convulsed by party dissensions. The English were too easily persuaded that Lord Bute possessed a dangerous and unconstitutional influence. The oppositon, in parliament, remarkably anxious at that time, to adopt any watch-word that might rally the popular affections around them, filled the kingdom with exclamations against the double cabinet, and the "influence behind the throne which controuled the throne itself."—This was the clamour of the day. And the incidental affair of the expulsion of Wilkes, which in ordinary times would have been considered only as an irregularity, and rectified as such, added fuel to the flames, and rendered the country and metropolis one scene of mob, sedition, and clamour.

Mr. Horne immediately embraced the popular cause, and united himself with Wilkes. He visited him at Paris during his exile, and when he failed in his attempt to obtain his return in parliament, in 1768, Mr. Horne warmly adopted his interests, canvassed the town and country for him, opened houses, solicited votes and subscriptions, and ultimately procured him to be returned as the member for Middlesex.

Shortly afterwards a rupture ensued between these friends. Mr. Tooke did not find Wilkes that violent patriot which he had anticipated. When Wilkes had obtained what he wanted, and was provided for by the liberality of the city, who made him their chamberlain, Wilkes was satisfied, and therefore quiet. Horne Tooke lost his firebrand, and he resented it by a public attack and abuse of him.

Junius, the writer of the letters under that name, imputed this dispute to its just origin: Horne Tooke wrote a letter in reply to him, which appears in the collection of that work. It is certainly an admirable specimen of his talents, and only excites a regret, that such wit, satire, and eloquence, should be accompanied by so little goodness.

Junius replied in an angry declamation, and Horne Tooke rejoined in another, as singular for its boldness, as for its splendor and real eloquence. In this answer, Mr. Tooke first announced himself the champion of those principles which afterwards set Europe in a flame. He employed, amongst others, the following pointed sentence, which, however true in the abstract, no honest man should openly produce as a maxim of action;—"The king, whose actions justify rebellion to his government, deserves death from the hand of every subject, and should such a time arrive, I should be as free to act as any."—Now, though there is nothing erroneous in the bare abstract assertion of this principle, yet it is one of those which tend to weaken the necessary respect and attachment of sovereigns and subjects. Questions of this nature must never be argued. The matter must speak for itself.

Mr. Horne again came forward as the popular advocate in the American war. When the war was commenced by the skirmish at Lexington, Mr. Horne opened a subscription, and advertised in the public papers "for the relief of our unfortunate brethren in America, basely murdered by the British troops." The attorney-general very properly prosecuted him for this insult on the government, and the jury very justly found him guilty.—He was in consequence imprisoned in the King's Bench.

Mr. Horne Tooke had now nothing to hope from ecclesiastical preferment. He therefore, with the most shameless indecency, if not with direct impiety, threw off his clerical gown, and produced himself as a layman. He resigned the living at Brentford, and entered himself of the society of the Inner Temple. He kept his commons regularly, and studied the law as a profession.

The period at length arrived, in which, having kept the necessary terms, he was to be called to the bar. He put in his claim for this nomination. But the benchers, with a feeling which did them honor, unanimously rejected him, on the BOOK XI. grounds, that having been in holy orders, they could not countenance such an indecent and impious desertion.

CHAP. III.

1812.

As Mr. Horne Tooke's abilities, and his violence were sometimes of great use to the leaders of parties, he was occasionally much courted and highly considered by them. Mr. Fox declared him to be a man of very eminent use to the commonwealth, and publicly patronised and praised him.

Mr. Tooke came forward as a candidate for Westminster in 1790. Mr. Fox and Lord Hood stood at the same time. On this occasion he kept himself in reserve till the very morning of the election, when he published a hand-bill, in which he declared his purpose. Mr. Tooke did not of course succeed, and he presented in consequence a petition to parliament, in which he treated all parties with the utmost insolence. It was written, however, in his usual style of plain energy and popular eloquence.

Mr. Tooke next appeared as the advocate of the French revolution, and he soon attracted the attention of government upon his movements, and avowed principles. He was arrested as a traitor, and tried by a special commission. The jury acquitted the whole of them, but the popular voice, or at least the best part of the people, though they did not approve of the violence of the accusation, felt only one regret, that they had not been all tried for sedition instead of treason.

Mr. Tooke, in the interval of his political pursuits, published several excellent pieces of literature. His principal work of this kind is the "Diversions of Purley," a most profound and learned grammatical treatise.

Mr. Tooke likewise published an attack on his royal highness the prince-regent, and in a pamphlet on the marriage-act, took occasion to speak with his usual contempt of the royal family.

Lord Camelford, an eccentric character, at length procured Mr. Tooke to be returned as member of parliament for the borough of Old Sarum. On Monday, Feb. 16, 1801, he took his seat, and on the 4th of May he was declared ineligible, as having been in holy orders. His seat was in consequence vacated, and a new writ issued.

From this period Mr. Tooke has been only known as the friend and political instructor of Sir Francis Burdett, and whatever might have been the feeling of the country upon the loss of a man of so much faction, bustle, and celebrity, Sir Francis, we believe, had occasion sincerely to regret his death.

Mr. Horne Tooke died at Wimbledon, about twelve o'clock on the night of March 18, 1812, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. He had lost the use of his lower extremities, and his dissolution had been for some time expected. Symptoms of mortification recently appeared, which soon occasioned his death. He was attended by his two daughters, Dr. Pearson, Mr. Cline, and Sir Francis Burdett. Being informed of his approaching change, he signified, with a placid look, that he was fully prepared, and had reason to be grateful for having passed so long and so happy a life, which he would willingly have had extended if it had been possible. He expressed satisfaction at being surrounded in his last moments by those most dear to him; and his confidence in the existence of a supreme being, whose final purpose was the happiness of his creatures. His facetiousness did not forsake him. When supposed to be in a state of entire insensibility, Sir Francis Burdett mixed up a cordial for him, which his medical friends said it would be to no purpose to administer; but Sir Francis persevered, and raised Mr. Tooke, who opened his eyes, and seeing who offered the draught, took the glass and drank the contents with eagerness. He had previously observed, that he should not be like the man of Strasburgh, who, when doomed to death, requested time to pray, till the patience of the magistrates was exhausted, and then, as a last expedient, begged to be permitted to close his life with his favourite amusement of nine-pins, but who kept howling on, with an evident determination never to finish the game. He desired that no funeral ceremony should be said over his remains, but that six of the poorest men in the parish should have a guinea each for bearing him to the vault in his garden.

From the importance and universal interest which attached at this crisis to the orders in council, we shall conclude this chapter with a full and perspicuous representation of them, and endeavour, by an impartial, compendious, and chronological statement of the several official documents, to bring the whole series of the French, British, and American proceedings in one view.

1. The first of these documents, the Berlin decree, so called because it was issued from the camp near that city on the 21st of November, 1806. It consisted of two parts:

1st, A statement of the wrongs done by England.

2d. Of the measures which these wrongs obliged the emperor to adopt.

The first part stated: "That England had ceased to observe the laws of civilized nations—that she considers the individual of a hostile nation as enemies—that she seizes as prize the property of such individuals—that she blockades commercial ports, bays, and mouths of rivers, and other places not fortified—that she declares places to be in a state of blockade where she has no actual force to enforce the blockade—that this abuse is intended to aggrandize the commerce and industry of England by means of the commerce and industry of the continent—that those who traffic in English commodities on the continent second her views and render themselves her accomplices—that this conduct of England is worthy the age of barbarism, and is advantageous to her at the expence of every other nation—that it is just to attack her with the same weapons which she employs.”

And in pursuance of this assertion the second part proceeded to decree:—

“That the British islands are in a state of blockade.”

“That all commerce and correspondence with the British isles are prohibited.”

“That letters and packets addressed to England or to Englishmen, or written in English, shall be intercepted.”

“That every British individual whom the troops of France or those of her allies can lay hold of, shall be a prisoner of war.”

“That every warehouse, any commodity, every article of commerce which may belong to a British subject is good prize.”

“That the trade in English goods is prohibited, and every article that belongs to England, or is the produce of her manufactories or colonies, is good prize.”

“That no ship from England or her colonies, or which shall have touched there, shall be admitted into any harbour.”

“That this decree shall be communicated to all our allies whose subjects as well as those of France have been victims of the injustice and barbarity of the English maritime code.”

“And this decree is further stated to be in force, and considered as a fixed and fundamental law of the French empire, as long as England shall adhere to the principles herein complained of.”

The sum of this decree was, that England should be erased from the list of commercial and even civilized nations, until she abandoned her maritime code, which had raised her to her present pitch of superiority over other nations, and that France and her allies and dependants were pledged and required invariably to maintain this, which had been since called the continental system, till England should have been reduced to make these concessions.

2. On the 24th of November, 1806, the above decree was recapitulated in a proclamation from the French minister to the senate of Hamburg, which stated:

“That as several of the citizens of Hamburg were notoriously engaged in trade with England, the Emperor of the French was obliged to take possession of the city in order to execute his decree.”

This threat was the same day executed by Marshal Mortier, at the head of a division of the French army. BOOK XI.

This proclamation and occupation of Hamburg was particularly important, as being the first act of that principle on which France, at this period, proceeded, of not only extending her continental system to all places within her reach, but actually seizing upon neutral countries that she might extend the continental system to them; so that the original violence and injustice against England became the source and pretence of more violence and injustice against all rights and laws of nations, and an excuse for the most outrageous usurpation and hostile seizure of neutral territory that had ever been attempted. CHAP. III. 1812.

3. These proceedings of the government of France produced, on the part of England, the measure which was called Lord Grey's order in council, because his lordship was secretary of state at the time it was issued—7th January, 1807. This order stated:

“That the decrees issued by the French government to prohibit the commerce of neutral nations with the British dominions, or in their produce or manufactures, are in violation of the usages of war.”

“That such attempts on the part of the enemy would give his majesty an unquestionable right of retaliation; and would warrant his majesty in enforcing against all commerce with France, the same prohibition which she vainly hopes to effect against us.”

“That his majesty, though unwilling to proceed to these extremities, yet feels himself bound not to suffer such measures to be taken by the enemy, without some step on his part to restrain this violence, and to retort upon them the evils of their own injustice.”

“And that, therefore, it is ordered, that no vessel shall be permitted to trade from one port to another belonging to France or her allies, or so far under her controul that British vessels may not freely trade thereat.”

This was, as it expressed itself to be, a mitigated measure of retaliation; one intended rather to call France to a sense of her injustice and the neutrals to a sense of their own duty, than to inflict a vengeance on the enemy adequate to his aggression; but it very properly stated the right in Great Britain to go the whole length of complete retaliation; and it strongly intimated, that if this moderate proceeding should fail of its effect, more effective, but equally justifiable modes of retaliation would be adopted.

Shortly after the publication of this order, Lord Grenville's and Lord Grey's ministry went out of power, and that of the Duke of Portland, which included Mr. Perceval and Mr. Canning, came in. Finding the measures of further retaliliation threatened in Lord Grey's order of January preceding, were become absolutely necessary from the increasing violence of the French, and the continued supineness of the neutrals,

4. On the 11th of Nov. 1807, the Duke of Portland's administration issued two orders in council; the first of which stated:

"That the orders of the 7th of January, has not effected the desired purpose, either of compelling the enemy to recal his orders, or of inducing neutral nations to interpose against them; but, on the contrary, that they have been recently enforced with increased rigour."

"That his majesty is, therefore, obliged to take further measures for vindicating the just rights and maritime powers of his people, which are not more essential to our own safety than to the independence and general happiness of mankind; and in pursuance of these principles of retaliation, (already asserted in the first order) all the ports of France, and her allies, and all other ports or places in Europe from which the British flag is excluded, shall be considered in a state of blockade; and all their goods and manufactures shall be considered as lawful prize, thus retaliating upon France and her allies their own violence."

"That his majesty would, of course, be justified in making this retaliation, as unqualified and without limit, as the original offence; but that unwilling to subject neutrals to more inconvenience than is necessary, he will permit to neutrals such trade with the enemy's ports, as may be carried on directly with the ports of his majesty's dominions, under several specifications and conditions which are set forth as favorable exceptions to the general rules of blockade."

The second order in council of this date set forth:

"That articles of the growth or manufacture of foreign countries cannot be by law, (namely the navigation act,) imported into Great Britain, except in British ships, or the native shipping of the country itself which produces the goods."

"That in consequence of the former order of this date, which says, that all neutral trade with France must touch at a British port, it is expedient to relax, in some degree, this law, and to permit the shipping of any friendly or neutral country to import into Great Britain the produce or manufactures of countries at war with her."

"That all goods so imported shall be liable to the same duties, and under the same warehousing regulation as if imported according to the navigation act."

The sum of these orders in council is, that France having declared that there should be no trade in communication with England, his majesty resolved that the ports of France, and every port from which, by the controul of France, the British flag was excluded, should have no trade except to or from a British port; but that his majesty was still desirous to encourage and protect neutral commerce, as far as was consistent with such an opposition to the enemy's measures, as was essential to the safety and prosperity of the British dominions.

Next came the decree, dated Milan, December 17, and published in Paris the 26th of December, 1807, reciting:

"That the ships of neutral and friendly powers are, by the English orders in council of the 11th of November, made liable not only to be searched, but to be detained in England, and to pay a tax rateable per centum on the cargo.

"That, by these acts, the British government denationalizes ships of every nation; and that it is not competent to any sovereign or country to submit to this degradation of the neutral flag, as England would construe such submission into an acquiescence in her right to do so; as she has already availed herself of the tolerance of other governments, to establish the infamous principle that free ships do not make free goods, and to give the right of blockade an arbitrary extension, which infringes on the sovereignty of every state, and it is therefore decreed,

"That every ship, to whatever nation it may belong, which shall have submitted to be searched by an English ship, or to a voyage to England, or shall have paid any English tax is, for that alone, declared to be denationalized, to have forfeited the protection of its own sovereign, and to have become English property."

"That all such ships, whether entering the ports of France, or her allies, or met at sea, are good prizes."

"That the British islands are in a state of blockade, both by sea and land, and that all vessels sailing from England, or any of her colonies, or the port of any of her allies to England, or her colonies, or the port of an ally, are declared good and lawful prizes."

"That these measures (which are resorted to only in just retaliation of the barbarous system adopted by England, which assimilates its legislation to that of Algiers,) shall cease to have effect with respect to all nations who shall have the firmness to compel the English government to respect their flag. They shall continue to be rigorously enforced as long as that government does not return to the principle of the law of nations, which regulates the relation of civilized states in a state of war. The provisions of the present decree shall be abrogated and null, in fact, as soon as the English abide again by the principles of the law of nations, which are also the principles of justice and honor.

5.—A good deal of discussion arose with America about the operation of these decrees and orders upon the American trade; and in order to simplify the construction of the latter, and to apply the principle of retaliation more directly against France herself, and with less injury to neutrals, the orders of November, 1807, were superseded by that of the 26th of April, 1809; which declared "the whole coast of France and her dominions, as far northward as the river Ems, and southward to Pesaro and Orbitello in Italy, to be under blockade, and all vessels coming from any port whatever to any French port, liable to capture and condemnation;" the effect of this order was to open all ports, not actually ports of France, even though the British flag should be excluded therefrom, to neutral commerce, and to place France, and France only, in the precise situation in which, by her decrees, she endeavoured to place Great Britain.

7. By a decree of the French government, issued at Fontainebleau on the 19th of October, 1810, it was expressly declared, "that in pursuance of the fourth and fifth articles of the Berlin decrees, all kinds of British merchandize and manufactures which may be discovered in the custom-houses, or other places of France, Holland, the Grand Duchy of Berg, the Hanse Towns, (from the Mayne to the sea,) the kingdom of Italy, the Illyrian provinces, the kingdom of Naples, and in such towns of Spain and their vicinities as may be occupied by French troops, shall be confiscated and burned."

Thus the matter stood; on the side of France the decrees of Berlin and Milan were in force, and to them were opposed the British order of the 26th of April, 1809; and as long as the blockade of England by France remained unrepealed, so long England possessed an undoubted right to persist in her system of retaliation.

It now becomes necessary to explain shortly the conduct of America towards England and France respectively: from which we shall judge whether America acted with a strict impartiality towards the two belligerents, and whether she really had any fair ground of complaint against Great Britain.

8. A very short time before France began to act upon these new principles, a treaty of commerce had been, in 1806, negotiated at London, (between Lords Holland and Auckland on the part of England, and Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney on that of America,) and sent over to America to be ratified: but the Berlin decree having appeared almost at the moment of the signature of this treaty, it was accompanied by a declaration by Lords Holland and Auckland on the part of England:—

"That in consequence of the new and extraordinary measures of hostility on the part of France, as stated in the Berlin decree, Great Britain reserved to herself (if the threats should be executed, and that neutrals should acquiesce in such usurpations) the right of retaliating on the enemy in such manner as circumstances might require."

9. This treaty, the President of the United States refused to ratify; principally because the question of impressing seamen was not definitively settled. The British Government replied, that "this was a subject of much detail, and of considerable difficulty, arising out of the almost impossibility of distinguishing British subjects from Americans;" and, it added, "that it would be highly inexpedient that the general treaty should be lost, or even delayed, on this account; that Great Britain was ready immediately to proceed in a separate negociation in this point; and that, in the mean time, her officers should be ordered to exercise the right of search and impressment with the greatest possible forbearance."

These arguments and this proposition, did not, however, induce the American president to ratify the treaty.

It unfortunately happened (as before intimated in this book) that in June, 1807, the commanding officer of his majesty's ship Leopard having understood that some deserters from his ship had been received on-board the American frigate Chesapeake, and having in vain required their release from the American captain, attacked the Chesapeake at sea, and obliged her to strike; but he then contented himself with taking out of her his own men, and restored the ship to the American commander. An event of this nature called for, and received the immediate disavowal of his majesty's government; the captain was tried, and his admiral superseded; and Mr. Rose was sent, without loss of time, to America to offer reparation, and to state to the American government, "that Great Britain did not pretend to a right to demand by force any sailors whatever from the national ship of a power with which she was on terms of peace and amity." In the mean time the president had issued a proclamation, excluding all English ships of war from the American harbours.

10. Exclusive of this affair of the Chesapeake, America appeared, in the spring of 1808, to have considered herself equally aggrieved by the acts of both countries. In this view they laid a general embargo upon all the shipping in their ports, and denied themselves all commercial intercourse whatever with any European state.

11. This act of the American Government was very unpopular throughout the Union, and on the 1st of March, 1809, the non-intercourse law was substituted in its place, by which the commerce of America was opened to all the world except to England and France, and British and French ships of war were equally excluded prospectively from the American ports.

12. In the interval, Mr. Canning had instructed

BOOK XI.

CHAP. III.

1819.

Mr. Erskine, his majesty's minister, to offer to America a reciprocal repeal of the prohibitive laws on both sides, upon certain terms; namely, 1st. The enforcement of the non-intercourse and non-importation acts against France. 2dly, The renunciation, on the part of America, of all trade with the enemy's colonies, from which she was excluded during peace. 3dly, Great Britain to enforce the American embargo against trade with France, or powers acting under her decrees.

13. In the mean time, the French government, in a decree dated from Rambouillet, 23d of March, 1810, declared, "that from the 20th of May, 1809, all American vessels which should enter the French ports, or ports occupied by French troops, should be sold and sequestered. This act, however, was not made known till the 14th of May, 1810.

14. Notwithstanding these acts of violence on the part of France, America could not be persuaded that her honor and interests demanded some immediate act of retaliation, and nothing was done till the non-intercourse act expired, when an act of the congress was passed, eventually renewing certain parts of the non-intercourse act in certain events. By this act it was decreed, "that in case either of the belligerents should cease to violate the neutral rights of America before the 2d of February, 1811, the non-importation articles of the non-intercourse act should be revived against the other." By this act, America still contemplated France and England equally injuring her commerce; and contented herself with merely complaining, through her minister, of the operation of the Rambouillet decree, though it was, at the same time, characterised by America "as a signal aggression on the principles of justice and good faith."

15. The condition thus offered by America, France determined speciously to accept; but in accepting it to act in such a manner as still to reap the advantages accruing from her decrees, without relieving England from her part of the pressure occasioned by them.

16. As England could not, upon this insidious offer, accept the first part of the alternative offered by France, America, in her turn, accepted the second, and declared that she would cause her flag to be respected: but as there would be some inconvenience in demanding from England the abandonment of her most sacred maritime rights, such as the right of visiting and searching a neutral ship for enemy's property—the right of blockading, by actual force, the ports and harbours and rivers of the enemy's coast, the right of precluding a neutral from carrying on, in time of war, the trade of a belligerent, to which she is not admitted in time of peace—(all of which, and more indeed, was demanded by France, and apparently acceded to by America) the government and congress of the United States deemed it to be sufficiently conformable to the demands of France, "that they should exclude British ships of war from their ports, and prohibit all importation of British produce;" and France seemed to consent to consider "these restrictions as tantamount to causing the American flag to be respected, and as rescuing the American ships from the imputation of being denationalized." Upon this principle the president proclaimed the renewal of the non-importation articles of the non-intercourse act against Great Britain on the 2d of November, 1810, and the congress enacted the same by law on the 28th of February, 1811. When this act passed, the relations of peace and commercial intercourse were restored between France and America, and French ships were allowed to enter into the American ports, at a time when France still retained many millions of American property, seized under the Rambouillet decree, which had had a retrospective effect for the space of twelve months, and when the operation of the burning decree was carried into effect, without any regard whether or not the produce of British industry, so destroyed, had legally become, by purchase or barter, the bona fide property of neutral merchants.

With respect to England, who by the act of the 28th of February, 1811, was put upon the footing of an enemy, the only source of complaint which America possessed, was, that the blockade of the French coast was still persisted in and enforced, as the only effectual means of retaliating upon the violent and unjust decrees of the enemy.

17. On the 1st of November, 1811, Mr. Foster, his majesty's minister in America, was at length enabled to bring to a conclusion the differences which had arisen on the Chesapeake affair, without sacrificing the rights of Great Britain, or derogating from the honor of his majesty's crown; but it cannot be said, that the American government accepted the concession and atonement with either dignity or grace.—(See page 887.)

19. While America was thus asserting that the French decrees were repealed, the minister of foreign relations at Paris put an end to all doubt on the subject, by an official report to the emperor, dated the 10th of March, 1812, which set forth—first, an explanation of the maritime laws of the nations, viz.—

"The flag covers merchandize; the goods of an enemy, under a neutral flag, are neutral; and the goods of a neutral, under an enemy's flag, are enemy's goods. The only goods not covered by the flag, is contraband of war; and the only contraband of war are arms and ammunition. In visiting neutrals, a belligerent must send only a few men in a boat; but the belligerent ship must keep out of cannon shot. Neutrals may trade between one enemy's port to another, and between enemy's and neutral ports. The only ports excepted, are those really blockaded; and ports really blockaded, are those only which are actually invested, besieged, and in danger of being taken. Such are the duties of belligerents, and the rights of neutrals." The report then proceeded to state, that the Berlin and Milan decrees "have rendered the manufacturing towns of Great Britain deserts; distress has succeeded prosperity; and the disappearance of money, and the want of employment, endangers the public tranquillity." And then it denounced, that "until Great Britain recalls her orders in council, and submits to the principles of maritime law above-mentioned, the French decrees must subsist against Great Britain, and such neutrals as should allow their flags to be denationalized." And, finally, the report avowed, that "nothing will divert the French emperor from the objects of these decrees; that he has already, for this purpose, annexed to France, Holland, the Hanse Towns, and the coasts from the Zuyder Zee to the Baltic; that no ports of the continent must remain open, either to English trade or denationalized neutrals; and that all the disposeable force of the French empire shall be directed to every part of the continent, where British and denationalized flags still find admittance; and, finally, this system shall be persevered in, till England, banished from the continent, and separated from all other countries, shall return to the laws of nations recognized by the treaty of Utrecht."

Thus the Berlin and Milan decrees were in full force, and would continue to be so, until England should not only recall her orders in council, but should also abandon all her great maritime rights; and that these decrees would subsist against not England alone, but America, and all other countries which should not unite in an endeavour to overthrow the ancient system of maritime law; and, further, that France considered herself authorized to invade and seize any neutral territory whatsoever, for the sole object of excluding all British trade from the continent; and that all his violent and outrageous usurpations in Holland, Germany, and the shores of the Baltic, had been prompted, and were attempted to be justified, by this motive.

22. In order to bring to a distinct issue the verbal discussion between England and America, and to place the relative measures of England and France clearly before the neutrals, the British government, on the 21st of April, 1812, put forth to the public a declaration and order in council, detailing the present state of the contest between the two belligerents; and stating, "that as soon as the Berlin and Milan decrees are revoked, the orders in council are abrogated;" and engaging beforehand, "that a proof of the absolute repeal of the French decrees, produced in an admiralty court, shall be held, in fact, to be a satisfactory proof of the absolute revocation of the British orders in council."—(For this declaration see the preceding chapter.)

21. Since this declaration, but before it reached America, an embargo was laid on, by act of congress, for ninety days, from the 4th day of April, 1812.

Thus the matter stood; and, until France repealed her decrees, it was impossible that Great Britain could relinquish the principle of retaliation. The repeal of the orders in council would have had the following effects:—

1. It would restore the American trade; and that portion of manufactures, which are usually consumed in America itself, would immediately revive.

2. It would open to England no other market for any branch of manufacturing whatsoever than the home market of America; for France having a right, by municipal regulations, to exclude British articles from her territory, and to extend, for this purpose, her territory over the whole face of Europe, any article of British produce and manufacture imported by an American, would be liable to be confiscated or burned.

3. France would be relieved from all the pressure she at this time felt. America would supply her with all kinds of raw materials, as well as of colonial produce; and would convey to her, from the distant parts of Europe, all kinds of stores and timber, and the various materials of naval strength. France would have just what trade she pleased to have; she would continue the prohibition, all over Europe, of British manufactures, with a double view: first, to encourage her own; and next, to ruin those of Great Britain. And all inconvenience and pressure being thus removed from her, there would no longer have existed any means or hopes of forcing her to a system more equitable towards Great Britain.

4. America would have become the carrier of the world; she and France would have divided the trade of the globe; and Great Britain, with all her command of the sea, would have had the mortification to have seen the ocean covered with the commerce of France, protected under the American flag.

5. The British shipping interest would have been annihilated, and that of America would have risen up in its stead. The East and West Indies, and the home coasting trade, would alone have remained to England; and the two former could not have been long retained, in competition with a rival whose means of ship-building were inexhaustible; whose flag would have been the only neutral flag in the world; whose ships alone could have traded at the ports of the continent of Europe; whose rates of freight and insurance would have been proportionably small; in short, who would have had all possible advantages, while Great Britain would have laboured with every possible disadvantage.

6. All British produce and manufacture would have declined and expired, except only those for American or home consumption; because America, which would have brought the produce of all other countries to France, would have returned with the manufacture of France to all other countries. It might have been said, that England would have undersold France: and so she certainly would have done in a fair state of trade; but, excluded from Europe, and rivalled by America, there would have remained neither the means nor motives of commercial enterprize.

7. Nor would the American market itself have been of the advantage to Great Britain as at first imagined; much of the iron-work, and all the linens of Germany, would have soon undersold the similar articles of English or Irish manufacture; and the increased intercourse between America and France, would inevitably have obliged the merchants of the former to take returns in the produce of France, or the continent of Europe; and, by degrees, the natural result of such an intercourse would have been the advancement of manufactures, and the influence of France, and the decline of those of Great Britain.

CHAPTER IV.

The Prince-Regent's second Declaration respecting the Orders in Council.—Letters of Marque and Reprisal issued against England.—Declaration of War by America against England.—Consequences.—Case of the American Ship Snipe.

THE following second declaration, which appeared as a supplement to the London Gazette of Tuesday, June 23, is a further testimony of the pacific disposition of the British government towards the United States:—

“At the court at Carlton-house, the 23d of June, 1812, present, his Royal Highness the Prince-Regent in council.

“Whereas his royal highness the prince-regent was pleased to declare, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, on the 21st day of April, 1812, ‘that if at any time hereafter the Berlin and Milan decrees shall, by some authentic act of the French government, publicly promulgated, be absolutely and unconditionally repealed, then, and from thenceforth, the order in council of the 7th of January, 1807, and the order in council of the 26th of April, 1809, shall, without any farther order, be, and the same are hereby declared from thenceforth to be, wholly and absolutely revoked.’

“And whereas the chargé des affaires of the United States of America, resident at this court, did, on the 20th day of May last, transmit to Lord Viscount Castlereagh, one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, a copy of a certain instrument, then for the first time communicated to this court, purporting to be a decree passed by the government of France, on the 28th day of April, 1811, by which the decrees of Berlin and Milan are declared to be definitely no longer in force, in regard to American vessels.

“And whereas his royal highness the prince-regent, although he cannot consider the tenour of the said instrument as satisfying the conditions set forth in the said order of the 21st of April last, upon which the said orders were to cease and determine; is nevertheless disposed, on his part, to take such measures as may tend to re-establish the intercourse between neutral and belligerent nations, upon its accustomed principles. His royal highness the prince-regent, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, is therefore pleased, by and with the advice of his majesty's privy council, to order and declare, and it is hereby ordered and declared, that the order in council, bearing date the 7th day of January, 1807, and the order in council, bearing date the 26th day of April, 1809, be revoked, so far as may regard American vessels, and their cargoes, being American property, from the 1st day of August next.

“But whereas by certain acts of the government of the United States of America, all British armed vessels are excluded from the harbours and waters of the said United States, and the armed vessels of France being permitted to enter therein; and the commercial intercourse between Great Britain and the said United States is interdicted, the commercial intercourse between France and the said United States having been restored; his royal highness the prince-regent is pleased hereby farther to declare, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, that if the government of the said United States shall not, as soon as may be, after this order shall have been duly notified by his majesty's minister in America to the said government, revoke, or cause to be revoked, the said acts, this present order shall in that case, after due notice signified by his majesty's minister in America to the said government, be thenceforth null and of no effect.

"It is further ordered and declared, that all American vessels, and their cargoes, being American property, that shall have been captured subsequently to the 26th day of May last, for a breach of the aforesaid orders in council alone, and which shall not have been actually condemned before the date of this order; and that all ships and cargoes as aforesaid, that shall henceforth be captured under the said orders, prior to the 1st day of August next, shall not be proceeded against to condemnation till further orders; but shall, in the event of this order not becoming null and of no effect, in the case aforesaid, be forthwith liberated and restored, subject to such reasonable expences on the part of the captors as shall have been justly incurred.

"Provided, that nothing in this order contained, respecting the revocation of the orders herein-mentioned, shall be taken to revive wholly, or in part, the orders in council of the 11th of November, 1807, or any other order not herein-mentioned, or to deprive parties of any legal remedy to which they may be entitled under the order in council of the 21st of April, 1812.

"His royal highness the prince-regent is hereby pleased further to declare, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, that nothing in this present order contained, shall be understood to preclude his royal highness the prince-regent, if circumstances shall so require, from restoring, after reasonable notice, the orders of the 7th of January, 1807, and 26th of April, 1809, or any part thereof, to their full effect, or from taking such other measures of retaliation against the enemy as may appear to his royal highness to be just and necessary.

"And the right honorable the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury, his majesty's principal secretaries of state, the lords commissioners of the admiralty, and the judge of the high court of admiralty, and the judges of the courts of vice-admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein, as to them may respectively appertain.

"JAMES BULLER."

Before this declaration was known to the United States, it was understood that the American government had authorised the issuing of letters of marque and reprisal against England. In the house of commons, July 10, Mr. Brougham rose, and said, that it was rumoured that the house of representatives had moved a resolution for war with England: he wished to know whether government had received any official intelligence from their diplomatic agent in America. If war should take place, it was referable, in his opinion, to the declaration published by the late government in April.

Lord Castlereagh said, that government had received advice from his majesty's minister in America, that a warlike motion, of which the precise nature was not known, had passed the house of representatives, and was carried to the upper house, where the consideration of it was for some time delayed, and the exact result not known.

In the house of lords, July 21, the Duke of Norfolk rose to ask a question before his majesty's ministers left the house, respecting the reports which had recently been in circulation, of a declaration of war on the part of the United States of America against Great Britain. He wished to know whether those reports were true; and, if true, whether his majesty's ministers had any consolation to offer under this unfortunate situation of affairs?

The Earl of Liverpool stated, that his majesty's ministers had received information, through an indirect channel, that the senate of the United States had come to a vote concurring in the bill proposed by the house of representatives, for declaring war against Great Britain; but what measures the president had adopted in consequence of this vote of the senate, his majesty's ministers were at present uninformed. He could not, therefore, at the present moment, enter into any further explanation upon the subject.

At length the following declaration of war, by America, appeared in the British journals:—

Message.—To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

"I communicate to congress certain documents, being a continuation of those heretofore laid before them, on the subject of our affairs with Great Britain.

"Without going beyond the renewal, in 1803, of the war in which Great Britain is engaged, and omitting unrepaid wrongs of inferior magnitude, the conduct of her government presents a series of acts hostile to the United States, as an independent and neutral nation.

"British cruisers have been in the continued practice of violating the American flag on the great highway of nations, and of seizing and carrying off persons sailing under it; not in the exercise of a belligerent right, founded on the law of nations, against an enemy, but of a municipal prerogative over British subjects. British jurisdiction is thus extended to neutral vessels, in a situation where no laws can operate but the law of nations, and the laws of the country to which the vessels belong; and a self-redress is assumed, which if British subjects were wrongfully detained and alone concerned, is that substitution of force for a resort to the responsible sovereign, which falls within the definition of war. Could the seizure of British subjects, in such cases, be regarded as within the exercise of a belligerent right, the acknowledged laws of war, (which forbid an article of captured property to be adjudged, without a regular investigation before a competent tribunal,) would imperiously demand the fairest trial, where the sacred rights of persons were at issue. In place of such trial, these rights are subjected to the will of every petty commander.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. IV.

1812.

"The practice, hence, is so far from affecting British subjects alone, that under the pretext of searching for these thousands of American citizens, under the safeguard of public laws, and of their national flag, have been torn from their country, and from every thing dear to them; have been dragged on-board ships of war of a foreign nation, and exposed, under the severities of their discipline, to be exiled to the most distant and deadly climes, to risk their lives in the battles of their oppressors, and to be the melancholy instruments of taking away those of their own brethren.

"Against this crying enormity, which Great Britain would be so prompt to avenge, if committed against herself, the United States have in vain exhausted remonstrances and expostulations. And that no proof might be wanting of their conciliatory dispositions, and no pretext left for continuance of the practice, the British government was formally assured of the readiness of the United States to enter into arrangements, such as could not be rejected, if the recovery of the British subjects were the real and the sole object. The communication passed without effect.

"British cruisers have been in the practice also of violating the rights and the peace of our coasts. They hover over and harass our entering and departing commerce. To the most insulting pretensions they have added lawless proceedings in our very harbours, and have wantonly spilt American blood within the sanctuary of our territorial jurisdiction. The principles and rules enforced by that nation, when a neutral nation, against armed vessels of belligerents hovering near her coasts, and disturbing her commerce, are well known. When called on, nevertheless, by the United States, to punish the greater offences committed by her own vessels, her government has bestowed on their commanders additional marks of honor and confidence.

"Under pretended blockades, without the presence of an adequate force, and sometimes without the practicability of applying one, our commerce has been plundered in every sea: the great staples of our country have been cut off from their legitimate markets; and a destructive blow aimed at our agricultural and maritime interests. In aggravation of these predatory measures, they have been considered as in force from the dates of their notification; a retrospective effect being thus added, as has been done in other important cases, to the unlawfulness of the course pursued. And to render the outrage the more signal, these mock blockades have been reiterated and enforced in the face of official communications from the British government, declaring, as the true definition of a legal blockade, 'that particular ports must be actually invested, and previous warning given to vessels bound to them not to enter.'

"Not content with these occasional expedients for laying waste our neutral trade, the cabinet of Great Britain resorted, at length, to the sweeping system of blockades, under the name of orders in council, which has been moulded and managed as might best suit its political views, its commercial jealousies, or the avidity of British cruisers.

"To our remonstrances against the complicated and transcendent injustice of this innovation, the first reply was, that the orders were reluctantly adopted by Great Britain, as a necessary retaliation on decrees of her enemy proclaiming a general blockade of the British isles, at a time when the naval force of that enemy dared not to issue from his ports! She was reminded, without effect, that her own prior blockades, unsupported by an adequate naval force actually applied and continued, were a bar to this plea; that executed edicts against millions of our property could not be retaliation on edicts confessedly impossible to be executed; that retaliation, to be just, should fall on the party setting the guilty example, not on an innocent party, which was not even chargeable with an acquiescence in it.

"When deprived of this flimsy veil for a prohibition of our trade with Great Britain, her cabinet, instead of a corresponding repeal of a practical discontinuance of its orders, formally avowed a determination to persist in them against the United States, until the markets of her enemy should be laid open to British products; thus asserting an obligation on a neutral power to require one belligerent to encourage, by its internal regulations, the trade of another belligerent, contradicting her own practice towards all nations in peace as well as in war; and betraying the insincerity of those professions which inculcated a belief, that, having resorted to her orders with regret, she was anxious to find an occasion for putting an end to them.

"Abandoning still more all respect for the neutral rights of the United States, and for its own consistency, the British government now demands, as prerequisites to a repeal of its orders, as they relate to the United States, that a formality should be observed in the repeal of the French decrees no wise necessary to their termination, nor exemplified by British usage; and that the French repeal, besides including that portion of the decrees which operates within a territorial jurisdiction, as well as that which operates on the high seas, against the commerce of the United States, should not be a single special repeal in relation to the United States, but should be extended to whatever other neutral nations unconnected with them may be affected by those decrees.

"And, as an additional insult, they are called on for a formal disavowal of conditions and pretensions advanced by the French government, for which the United States are so far from having been themselves responsible, that, in official explanations, which have been published to the world, and in a correspondence of the American minister at London with the British minister of foreign affairs, such a responsibility was explicitly and emphatically disclaimed.

"It has become indeed sufficiently certain, that the commerce of the United States is to be sacrificed, not as interfering with belligerent rights of Great Britain, not as supplying the wants of their enemies, which she herself supplies, but as interfering with the monopoly which she covets for her own commerce and navigation. She carries on a war against the lawful commerce of a friend, that she may the better carry on a commerce with an enemy, a commerce polluted by the forgeries and perjuries which are for the most part the only passports by which it can succeed.

"Anxious to make every experiment, short of the last resort of injured nations, the United States have withheld from Great Britain, under successive modifications, the benefits of a free intercourse with their market, the loss of which could not but outweigh the profits accruing from her restrictions of our commerce with other nations. And to entitle those experiments to the more favorable consideration, they were so framed as to enable her to place her adversary under the exclusive operation of them. To these appeals her government has been equally inflexible, as if willing to make sacrifices of every sort, rather than yield to the claims of justice, or renounce the errors of a false pride. Nay, so far were the attempts carried to overcome the attachment of the British cabinet to its unjust edicts, that it received every encouragement within the competency of the executive branch of our government, to expect that a repeal of them would be followed by a war between the United States and France, unless the French edicts should also be repealed. Even this communication, although silencing for ever the plea of a disposition in the United States to acquiesce in those edicts, originally the sole plea for them, received no attention.

"If no other proof existed of a predetermination of the British government against a repeal of its orders, it might be found in the correspondence of the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at London, and the British secretary for foreign affairs, in 1810, on the question whether the blockade of May, 1806, was considered as in force or as not in force. It had been ascertained that the French government, which urged this blockade as the ground of its decree, was willing, in the event of its removal, to repeal that decree; which being followed by alternate repeals of the other offensive edicts, might abolish the whole system on both sides. This inviting opportunity for accomplishing an object so important to the United States, and professed so often to be the desire of both the belligerents, was made known to the British government. As that government admits that an actual application of an adequate force is necessary to the existence of a legal blockade; and it was notorious, that if such a force had ever been applied, its long discontinuance had annulled the blockade in question, there could be no sufficient objection on the part of Great Britain to a formal revocation of it; and no imaginable objection to a declaration of the fact that the blockade did not exist. The declaration would have been consistent with her avowed principles of blockade, and would have enabled the United States to demand from France the pledged repeal of her decrees; either with success, in which case the way would have been opened for a general repeal of the belligerent edicts; or without success, in which case the United States would have been justified in turning their measures exclusively against France. The British government would, however, neither rescind the blockade, nor declare its non-existence, nor permit its non-existence to be inferred and affirmed by the American plenipotentiary. On the contrary, by representing the blockade to be comprehended in the orders in council, the United States were compelled so to regard it in their subsequent proceedings.

"There was a period when a favorable change in the policy of the British cabinet was justly considered as established. The minister plenipotentiary of his Britannic majesty here proposed an adjustment of the differences more immediately endangering the harmony of the two countries. The proposition was accepted with a promptitude and cordiality corresponding with the invariable professions of this government. A foundation appeared to be laid for a sincere and lasting reconciliation. The prospect, however, quickly vanished. The whole proceeding was disavowed by the British government, without any explanation which could at that time repress the belief that the disavowal proceeded from a spirit of hostility to the commercial rights and prosperity of the United States. And it has since come into proof, that at the very moment when the public minister was holding the language of friendship, and inspired confidence in the sincerity of the negotiation with which he was charged, a secret agent of his government was employed in intrigues, having for their object a subversion of our government, and a dismemberment of our happy union.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. IV.

1812.

"In reviewing the conduct of Great Britain towards the United States, our attention is necessarily drawn to the warfare just renewed by the savages on one of our extensive frontiers—a warfare which is known to spare neither age nor sex, and to be distinguished by features peculiarly shocking to humanity. It is difficult to account for the activity and combinations which have for some time been developing themselves among the tribes in constant intercourse with the British traders and garrisons, without connecting their hostility with that influence, and without recollecting the authenticated examples of such interpositions heretofore furnished by the officers and agents of that government.

"Such is the spectacle of injuries and indignities which have been heaped on our country; and such the crisis which its unexampled forbearance and conciliatory efforts have not been able to avert. It might, at least, have been expected, that an enlightened nation, if less urged by moral obligations, or invited by friendly dispositions on the part of the United States, would have found in its true interests alone a sufficient motive to respect their rights and their tranquillity on the high seas; that an enlarged policy would have favored the free and general circulation of commerce, in which the British nation is at all times interested; and which, in times of war, is the best alleviation of its calamities to herself, as well as the other belligerents; and more especially that the British cabinet would not, for the sake of a precarious and surreptitious intercourse with hostile markets, have persevered in a course of measures which necessarily put at hazard the invaluable market of a great and growing country, disposed to cultivate the mutual advantages of an active commerce.

"Other councils have prevailed. Our moderation and conciliation have had no other effect than to encourage perseverance, and to enlarge pretensions. We behold our seafaring citizens still the daily victims of lawless violence, committed on the great and common highway of nations, even within sight of the country which owes them protection. We behold our vessels freighted with the products of our soil and industry, on returning with the honest proceeds of them, wrested from their lawful destinations, confiscated by prize-courts, no longer the organs of public law, but the instruments of arbitrary edicts; and their unfortunate crews dispersed and lost, or forced, or inveigled, in British ports, into British fleets; whilst arguments are employed in support of these aggressions, which have no foundation but in a principle equally supporting a claim to regulate our external commerce in all cases whatsoever.

"We behold, in fine, on the side of Great Britain, a state of war against the United States—and on the side of the United States, a state of peace towards Great Britain.

"Whether the United States shall continue passive under these progressive usurpations, and these accumulating wrongs; or, opposing force to force, in defence of their natural rights, shall commit a just cause into the hands of the Almighty Disposer of events; avoiding all connections which might entangle it in the contests or views of other powers, and preserving a constant readiness to concur in an honorable re-establishment of peace and friendship, is a solemn question, which the constitution wisely confides to the legislative department of the government. In recommending it to their early deliberations, I am happy in the assurance that the decision will be worthy the enlightened and patriotic councils of a virtuous, a free, and a powerful nation.

"Having presented this view of the relations of the United States with Great Britain, and of the solemn alternative growing out of them, I proceed to remark, that the communications last made to congress, on the subject of our relations with France, will have shown that since the revocation of her decrees as they violated the neutral rights of the United States, her government has authorised illegal captures by its privateers and public ships, and that other outrages have been practised on our vessels and our citizens. It will have been seen also, that no indemnity had been provided, or satisfactorily pledged, for the extensive spoliations committed under the violent and retrospective order of the French government against the property of our citizens seized within the jurisdiction of France.

"I abstain at this time from recommending to the consideration of congress, definitive measures with respect to that nation, in the expectation that the result of unclosed discussions between our minister plenipotentiary at Paris and the French government, will speedily enable congress to decide with greater advantage on the course due to the rights, the interests, the honor of our country.

"JAMES MADISON.

"Washington, June 1, 1812."

The following is the act which was read in a secret sitting of the two houses on the 1st of June, and which gave rise to the motion that placed the two countries in a state of war:—

"An act, declaring war between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, and the United States of America, and their territories.

"Be it enacted, by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, that war be, and the same is hereby declared to exist between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the dependencies thereof, and the United States of America, and their territories; and that the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorised to use the whole land and naval forces of the United States to carry the same into effect; and to issue to private armed vessels of the United States, commissions of letters of marque and general reprisal, in such form as he shall think proper, and under the seal of the United States, against the vessels, goods, and effects of the government of the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the subjects thereof.—June 18, 1812.—Approved.

“JAMES MADISON.”

In consequence of the above declaration of war, orders were issued, July 31, from the admiralty, to all commanding officers of the navy, to detain and send in all American vessels whatever. An embargo was at the same time laid on all American vessels in the river, and an order to a similar effect was sent off to all the out-ports.

This war against Great Britain had several opponents in the United States. Mr. Randolph, in an interesting address to his constituents, thus concluded;—

“Having learned, from various sources, that a declaration of war would be attempted on Monday last with closed doors, I deemed it my duty to endeavour, by an exercise of my constitutional functions, to arrest this heaviest of all possible calamities, and avert it from our unhappy country. I accordingly made the effort of which I now give you the result, and of the success of which you will already have been informed before these pages reach you. I pretend only to give the substance of my unfinished arguments. The glowing words—the language of the heart—have passed away with the occasion that called them forth: they are no longer under my controul. My design is simply to submit to you the views which have induced me to consider a war with England, under existing circumstances, as comporting neither with the interest nor the honor of the American people; but as an idolatrous sacrifice of both, on the altar of French rapacity, perfidy, and ambition. France has for years past offered us terms of undefined commercial arrangement, at the price of a war with England, which hitherto we have not wanted firmness and virtue to reject. The price is now to be paid.

“We are tired of holding out; and, following the example of the nations of continental Europe, entangled in the artifices, or awed by the power of the destroyer of mankind, we are prepared to become instrumental to his projects of universal dominion. Before these pages meet your eye, the last republic of the earth will have enlisted under the banners of the tyrant, and become a party of his cause. The blood of American freemen must flow, to cement his power,—to aid in stifling the last struggles of afflicted and persecuted man,—to deliver up into his hands the patriots of Spain and Portugal, to establish his empire over the ocean, and over the land that gave our forefathers birth,—to forge our own chains; and yet, my friends, we are told, as we were told in the days of the mad ambition of Mr. Adams, ‘that the finger of heaven points to war.’ Yes, the finger of heaven does point to war. It points to war, as it points to the mansion of eternal misery and torture,—as to a flaming beacon, warning us of that vortex which we may not approach but with certain destruction. It points to desolated Europe, and warns us of the chastisement of those nations who have offended against the justice, and almost beyond the mercy of heaven. It announces the wrath to come upon those who, ungrateful for the bounty of Providence,—not satisfied with peace, liberty, security, plenty at home,—fly, as it were, into the face of the most high, and tempt his forbearance.

“To you I can speak with freedom, and it becomes me to do so; nor shall I be deterred by the cavils and the sneers of those who hold as ‘foolishness’ all that favours not of worldly wisdom, from expressing fully and freely these sentiments, which it has pleased God, in his mercy, to engrave upon my heart. These are no ordinary times. The state of the world is unexamined. The war of the present day is not like that of our revolution, or any which preceded it, at least, in modern times. It is a war against the liberty and happiness of mankind: it is a war, of which the whole human race are the victims, to gratify the pride and lust of power of a single individual.

“I beseech you, put it to your own bosoms, how far it becomes you as freemen, as christians, to give your aid and sanction to this impious and bloody warfare against your brethren of the human family. To such among you, if any such there be, who are insensible to motives not more dignified and manly than they are intrinsically wise, I would make a different appeal. I adjure you, by the regard which you have for your own security and property, for the liberties and inheritance of your children, by all that you hold dear and sacred, to interpose your constitutional powers, to save your country and yourselves from a calamity, the issue of which it is not given to human foresight to divine.

“Ask yourselves, if you are willing to become the virtual allies of Bonaparte? Are you willing, for the sake of annexing Canada to the Northern States, to submit to that overgrowing system of

BOOK XI.

CHAP. IV.

1812.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. IV.

1812.

taxation, which sends the European labourer supperless to bed?—to maintain, by the sweat of your brow, armies, at whose hands you are to receive a future master? Suppose Canada ours, is there any one among you who would ever be, in any respect, the better for it, the richer, the freer, the happier, the more secure? And is it for a boon like this, that you join in the warfare against the liberties of man in the other hemisphere, and put your own in jeopardy?"

Mr. Foster is said to have recommended that the war, in the first instance, should not be pursued with vigour on the part of the British, under the hope that conciliation would be the result, as soon as the real intentions of the British government should be ascertained. It was not supposed, that, of the American army, more than 1,000 men were in a fit state to undergo the discipline, and undertake the duties of war; and that Sir George Prevost, with 8,000 men, might easily penetrate into the interior of the republic. Immediately after war was declared, Mr. Foster demanded and received his passports.

About this time (July 31) Sir William Scott pronounced the judgment of the admiralty-court in the case of the American ship Snipe, the arguments upon which had lasted for several days. "The captor had contended, that the ship was liable to condemnation, under the orders in council, she having been taken, on the 28th of March, 1812, entering the river of Bourdeaux; while, on the other hand, the claimants contended, that those orders in council had ceased to operate before the capture, on account of a French decree, bearing date the 28th of April, having repealed the Berlin and Milan decrees, to which those orders had only been retaliatory measures, which the British government were pledged to annul from the date of the repeal of the French decrees. As the claimants contended that the Berlin and Milan decrees were actually repealed by the French decree of 1811, it was for them to prove that those decrees were so repealed, and that they were repealed in such a manner, as to impose an obligation on other nations to take notice of such a repeal. This sort of evidence, which was only to be got in the enemy's country, was perfectly accessible to the claimants (if any such evidence existed), but was not accessible to the captors. The Berlin and Milan decrees had been ushered into the world with the greatest solemnity, and published in the French official papers. There was no one who could doubt their existence or authenticity. If those decrees were intended to be repealed, why were they not repealed in a manner equally authentic and official? In the said month of March, they were, however, officially spoken of by the French government as not only being in existence, but as fundamental laws of the empire. If that word carried any meaning, it must imply that the French government would not abandon those decrees. Those decrees had been promulgated to the world in the most authentic and public manner; and if there had been any intention of repealing them, it might be expected, on every principle of good faith and honest policy, that the revocation should be made equally public, or, at least, that it should be made public to all those whom it might concern. The British government, however, by no means recognized the authenticity of the instrument put into their hands on the 20th of May, or acknowledged that paper as a bona fide decree of repeal, bearing the date prefixed to it; but revoked the orders in council, as a measure of conciliation to America. The date of this paper was neither subsequent to his majesty's declaration of the 21st of April, nor had it been publicly promulgated, nor had it been acted upon. To meet the terms of the declaration of April, it ought to have been a repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees generally, and not merely with respect to America. It ought to have been unconditional, and its authenticity regularly proved. This was, in fact, the title-deed under which the parties claimed: and its authenticity was, therefore, the first thing to be proved by them. The paper had no appearance of authenticity on the face of it, as it bore date in April, 1811, and had never been produced or heard of till May, 1812.

"An untrue date being found attached to it was a falsification of a fatal nature, when the deception was evidently intended for the purpose of fraud. There was every reason to believe that the instrument never had existence, until the French government had received the declaration of the 21st of April. There was no individual who ventured to assert any knowledge of its previous existence. In the warm controversy which had taken place between America and this country on the subject, the correspondence on our part consisted very much of a demand for the production of any authentic document repealing those decrees. No such document was known by the American minister; no such document was known to the tribunals, or prize-courts of France; or to those persons who were principally affected by it. He would be doing a great injustice, indeed, to Mr. Russel, if he were to attribute his silence, upon this head, to any thing but his complete ignorance of the existence of such a document: he was the American minister in France, at the date of this decree, and yet he had never made any allusion to such a document, in answer to the many pressing solicitations which had been made to him to procure evidence of the repeal. When the ruler of France chose to send this paper into the world, antedated by above a year, it was evidently one of those exorbitant demands which that person is in the habit of making on the credulity of mankind. The court would not now admit farther proof of such a document having been in existence; such proof could only be sought in the officina fraudis, whence the fabrication first issued, with every stain of inbred corruption on its front. It appeared that the French ruler left the question of restitution of American vessels to be determined by his special pleasure. Now this country did demand, and had a right to demand, that there should be a clear and definite rule of law, acting in a clear and definite manner; and that matters of this sort should not be left in a state of uncertainty, or perpetual fluctuation. It, therefore, appeared to him, that there was no evidence that any legal revocation of those decrees had taken place; and that the instrument relied upon by the claimants, as their title-deed, had no marks of authenticity about it, but was evidently fabricated for a particular purpose. He should determine on the case before him, and on all those that depended on the same principle, that the instrument, purporting to be a French decree, dated in April, 1811, did not take those cases out of the general operation of the law, as described in the orders in council; and that, therefore, those vessels captured under them, before the 20th of May, 1812, could not be discharged from their operation. It was only to the vessels captured after the 20th of May, that the revocation of the orders in council applied."

BOOK XI.

CHAP. VI.

1812.

CHAPTER V.

The Conduct of the United States retaliated.—Commencement of Hostilities by an American Squadron.—Gallant Conduct of the Belvidera English Frigate.—Captures of several American Privateers.—Posture of Affairs on the Canadian Lines.—Disturbances at Baltimore.—Murder of General Lingan.—Interesting Extract from Hanson's Letter.

As the conduct of America demanded retaliation, the following resolutions took place at the court at Carlton-house, October 13, his royal highness the prince-regent present in council.

"Whereas, in consequence of information having been received of a declaration of war by the government of the United States of America against his majesty, and of the issue of letters of marque and reprisal by the said government against his majesty, and his subjects, an order in council, bearing date the 31st of July last, was issued, directing that American ships and goods should be brought in, and detained till further orders. And whereas his royal highness the prince-regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, forebore, at that time, to direct letters of marque and reprisal to be issued against the ships, goods, and citizens of the said United States of America, under the expectation that the said government would, upon the notification of the order in council of the 23d of June last, forthwith recal and annul the said declaration of war against his majesty, and also annul the said letters of marque and reprisal:

"And whereas the said government of the United States of America, upon due notification to them of the said order in council of the 23d of June last, did not think fit to recal the said declaration of war and letters of marque and reprisal, but have proceeded to condemn, and persisted in condemning, the ships and property of his majesty's subjects as prize of war, and have refused to ratify a suspension of arms agreed upon between Lieutenant-general Sir George Prevost, his majesty's governor-general of Canada, and General Dearborn, commanding the American forces in the northern provinces of the United States, and have directed hostilities to be recommenced in that quarter:

"His royal highness the prince-regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, and with the advice of his majesty's privy-council, has hereby pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that general reprisals be granted against the ships, goods, and citizens of the United States of America, and others inhabiting within the territories thereof (save and except any vessels to which his majesty's license has been granted, or which have been directed to be released from the embargo, and have not terminated the original voyage, on which they were detained and released), so that as well his majesty's fleets and ships, as also all other ships and vessels that shall be commissioned by letters of marque, or general reprisals, or otherwise, by his majesty's commissioners for executing the office of lord-high-admiral of Great Britain, shall and may lawfully seize all ships, vessels, and goods belonging to the government of the United States of America, or the citizens thereof, or others inhabiting within the territories thereof, and bring the same to judgment in any of the courts of admiralty within his majesty's dominions; and to that end his majesty's advocate-general, with the advocate of the admiralty, are forthwith to prepare the draught of a commission, and present the same to his royal highness the prince-regent, at this board, authorising the commissioners for executing the office of lord-high-admiral, or any person or persons by them empowered and appointed, to issue forth and grant letters of marque and reprisals to any of his majesty's subjects, or others whom the said commissioners shall deem fitly qualified in that behalf, for the apprehending, seizing, and taking the ships, vessels, and goods belonging to the government of the United States of America, or the citizens thereof, or others inhabiting within the countries, territories, or dominions thereof (except as aforesaid); and that such powers and clauses be inserted in the said commission as have been usual, and are according to former precedents; and his majesty's advocate-general, with the advocate of the admiralty, are also forthwith to prepare the draught of a commission, and present the same to his royal highness the prince-regent, at this board, authorising the said commissioners, for executing the office of lord-high-admiral, to will and require the high court of admiralty of Great Britain, and the lieutenant and judge of the said court, his surrogate or surrogates, as also the several courts of admiralty within his majesty's dominions, to take cognizance of, and judicially proceed upon, all and all manner of captures, seizures, prizes, and reprisals of all ships and goods that are or shall be taken, and to hear and determine the same; and according to the course of admiralty, and the laws of nations, to adjudge and condemn all such ships, vessels, and goods, as shall belong to the government of the United States of America, or the citizens thereof, or to others inhabiting within the countries, territories, and dominions thereof (except as aforesaid); and that such powers and clauses be inserted in the said commission as have been usual, and are according to former precedents; and they are likewise to prepare and lay before his royal highness the prince-regent, at this board, a draught of such instructions as may be proper to be sent to the courts of admiralty, in his majesty's foreign governments and plantations, for their guidance herein; as also another draught of instructions, for such ships as shall be commissioned for the purpose above-mentioned.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. V.

1812.

"His royal highness the prince-regent is nevertheless pleased hereby to declare, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, that nothing in this order contained shall be understood to recal or affect the declaration which his majesty's naval commander on the American station has been authorised to make to the government of the United States of America—namely, that his royal highness, animated by a sincere desire to arrest the calamities of war, has authorised the said commander to sign a convention, recalling and annulling, from a day to be named, all hostile orders issued by the respective governments, with a view of restoring, without delay, the relations of amity and commerce between his majesty and the United States of America.

"From the court at Carlton-house, the 13th of October, 1812.

"CASTLEREAGH.

N. VANSITTART.

CHARLES LONG.

LIVERPOOL.

BATHURST.

MELVILLE.

SIDMOUTH."

The American government having fitted out a fleet, with all possible dispatch, hostilities were commenced by an action with the Belvidera English frigate, which little vessel gallantly resisted an American squadron. The following account of this engagement was written by an officer on-board his majesty's ship Belvidera, dated Halifax, June 27.

"You will perceive by reports, which doubtless have reached England, that our little vessel can do something for her country. The event has been fortunate, and a source of joy and happiness to us.—On the 23d, at day-light, five sail were seen in chase of a merchantman, all standing before the wind. We chased, and discovered them to be men-of-war. The tables were soon turned, by our being chased: at twelve o'clock, the headmost ship, the President, was within gun-shot and an half; the United States within two gun-shots; and the Essex about three gun-shots. At half-past twelve, the President topped his spritsail-yard to windward. We then expected a shot, but all remained quiet; piped to dinner. The President was at some distance till three o'clock, when she began to draw on us, having got the wind first; the whole of us being before the wind: at about ten minutes before four, she then being three cables' length from us, she gave us a shot right through the rudder coat, which damaged the rudder; two more shots were fired, the second of which killed one man, and wounded several others. This shot being of a bad quality, it split into about fifty pieces. One of these men, who died twenty-four hours after of his wounds, had his arms amputated high up, and would have lived, had not two of his ribs been fractured, and driven into his lungs; notwithstanding which, after his wounds were dressed, he wanted to go on deck to have another shot at the cowards (so he termed them.) The rest of the wounded have merely flesh-wounds, except one, who has a large splinter in the knee, but will not lose the limb. Our captain, officers, and men, were cool and determined. The fine fellows asked the captain, if they should give it them.

"Poor Captain Byron has received a violent contusion in the upper and inside part of the thigh, which by the surgeon's account will turn to an abscess, and will be well in about a fortnight. The President's commander is a coward—he might have been alongside of us had he chosen it. He gave us seven or eight broadsides, independent of his bow guns; we tickled him with four, and only four stern-chasers, which were well applied to his bows; they were thrown into confusion, and I doubt not that many of the yankeys have left off messing. Our stern is cut much with their grape, but that did not kill any men. Six shots struck our counter; one went through our main-top-mast, and another through our cross-jack yard, from their trying to disable us in our rigging, and we to hull them. The annexed is a statement of our weight of metal, as compared with that of our American antagonists:—Belvidera, twenty-six eighteen-pounders, two nine-pounders, fourteen thirty-two-pounders, forty-two guns.—President frigate, mounting sixty-four guns, twelve and twenty-four-pounders; Constitution, fifty-four guns; United States, fifty-four guns; Essex, not certain; Argus, twenty guns."

His majesty's ship Acasta captured the American privateer brig Curlew, pierced for twenty guns, but having only sixteen on-board, with a complement of one hundred and seventy-two men. The sloop Colibri captured the American ship privateer Catherine, from Boston, out eight days, a beautiful and well-equipped ship, pierced for sixteen guns, mounting fourteen long six-pounders, and a complement of eighty-eight men, commanded by Francis A. Burnham; she had one man killed, and one wounded; her men ran below, which accounts for their suffering so small a loss. The sloop Emulous captured the American privateer brig Gossamer, of fourteen carriage-guns, with one hundred men; she left Boston on the 24th of August, had made one capture, the ship Mary Anne of Greenock, from Jamaica bound to Quebec.

On the other hand, his majesty's ship Alert was captured by the American frigate Essex, (Aug. 13.) The captain of the Essex ingeniously employed the Alert as a cartel, by which expedient, she was secure from re-capture; otherwise she would probably have been re-taken before she had reached the American port St. John's, Newfoundland.

The British armed ship Queen Charlotte, who had been lying at Fort Erie, left her moorings soon after the declaration of war was received, and proceeded up the lake; and afterwards lay at Fort Malden, the great depôt of Indian supplies. His majesty's sloop of war Hunter went up the straits of Mackina, passed into Lake Michigau, and captured an American merchant-vessel.

General Brock, president of the parliament of Upper Canada, acting governor of the province and commander-in-chief of his majesty's forces in Upper Canada, was early in July at Newark, superintending the various defences on the river. This able and experienced officer came from Little York soon after hearing the declaration of war, and it was believed, with a serious intention of attacking Fort Niagara; but, contrary to what had been reported, he made no demand of a surrender.

Expecting a descent from the American army, the Canadians had, for several days, been removing their families and effects from the river into the interior. At Newark, Queenston, and other villages on the river, there were no inhabitants left, except a few civil officers and soldiers. An immense quantity of specie, plate, &c. from various parts of the province, had also been boxed up, and destined for Quebec.

The British had about six or seven hundred regular troops stationed between the lakes, from Fort George to Fort Erie. These men were generally those who had seen service in various parts of the world. The militia of the province were ordered out en masse.

The British had more than one hundred pieces of flying, field, and garrison artillery, in the different defences on the Niagara river. Fort Erie had been strengthened considerably. There was also a small battery on the point below Chip-pawa, mounted with two pieces of heavy artillery, calculated to play upon the store-house and mills of Schlosser. Below the falls there was a small stone battery, near the bank of the river, where the lower ladder formerly stood. A rifleman who had deserted from the other side, and crossed the river immediately below the falls, on a pine log, stated, that but a little way from the battery up the river, a field-piece was stationed in the bushes in order to fire into Schlosser village. On the hill about half a mile from the stone battery, were placed two eighteen-pounders. The ladders on both sides of the river were taken up. During a thick foggy morning, four British soldiers, who stood as sentinels on the river, near Fort St. George, swam over to the American shore: three of them brought over their arms.

An American force having crossed the river under General Hull, hostilities commenced on the borders of Canada. At this time war was an employment so new to the people of the United States, that the humble operations of General Hull and his army were given with the most minute detail; and the driving in of a few advanced-posts actually delivered in a tone of triumph not unworthy a German campaign. The American force, composed entirely of the neighbouring militia, passed the river on the night of the 11th of July, at the town of Sandwich, two miles below Detroit; the British out-posts having been withdrawn the night before. On the 13th, the standard of the United States was erected in Canada, and a proclamation published, inviting the Canadian militia to retire to their homes, and promising peaceable and friendly treatment to the inhabitants on condition of neutrality. Considerable fear seemed to have been entertained of the junction of the Indians with the British; and the proclamation declared, that if they were once brought forward, no quarter was to be given. The next operation was to be an attack on Fort Malden, a work represented as of considerable strength. The passage of the river gave rise to an affair between the advance of the Americans, amounting to 300, and the British and Indians. On the first sight of their enemy, the Indians fled into a wood, and the British followed them, with the loss of one or two killed: but down to the 22d, no movement appeared to have been made; and General Hull, by building block-houses, and forming entrenched camps, seemed to be labouring under some apprehensions for his own security.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. V.

1812.

Great riots were now occasioned by the publication of a journal called the "Federal Republican." A mob was excited to assassinate the publisher and editors. About nine o'clock at night, an attempt was made to destroy Mr. Hanson's house in South Charles-street.

The editors having anticipated the attack, had removed all the furniture, and had collected a number of their friends from the federal counties, among whom were Generals Lee and Langan, of Virginia and Georgetown. The mob could make no impression on the house, only breaking the windows with stones. Every time they attacked they were fired upon, and two were killed, and a number wounded. Towards morning, about forty infantry, and twenty horsemen, assembled and lined the street in front of the house, at which time the greatest part of the noble defenders of the house issued out in the rear, while those more immediately concerned remained, and told General Striker and the mayor, that they were willing to deliver themselves up to the civil authority, provided their safety was guaranteed by the general and the mayor. This was done; and the troops being formed into a hollow square, they opened the door, and were marched to jail. The following gentlemen went to prison:—Wm. Schroeder, John Thompson, General Harry Lee (of Virginia), W. B. Bend, Otho Sprigg, Henry Kennedy, Charles Kigore, Henry Nelson, John E. Hall, George Winchester, Peregrine Warfield, Alexander C. Hanson (editor), George Richards, Edward Gwynn, David Hoffman, Horatio Biglow, Ephraim Gaither, Wm. Gaither, Jacob Schley, Mark U. Pringle, Daniel Murray, Richard S. Crabb, James Lingan. About the time the troops assembled, the mob had procured a 4-pounder to fire on the house, but were prevented from using it by the military. The troops had been ordered out for the protection of the prison, and to keep the peace of the city; but, to their disgrace, they refused. The next day the mob forced the jail, and fell with the fury of cannibals on twenty-six unarmed prisoners, and beat them with clubs until no signs of life remained, when they left them, thinking they had fully completed the bloody deed: providentially they all, in a short time, showed signs of life, except General Lingan, who never recovered: he was a man of great influence in his county, having been formerly collector of the customs at Georgetown, to which office he had been appointed by General Washington, of whom he was a favorite, and who used frequently to visit him. He was about seventy years of age when his skull was split open.

Mr. Thompson was reserved for a public spectacle. After beating him, they put him into a cart, and rolled him in tar and feathers, set the feathers in a blaze, and at last lodged him in the watch-house. They still kept him confined, with his tar and feathers on him. The mayor and other influential characters of the party endeavoured to get him from them, but without effect. General Harry Lee died, and little hopes were entertained of the lives of others. Mr. Hanson, with three or four others, jumped amongst the mob, in the lobby of the prison, and escaped.

A general and unbounded indignation at the inhuman murder of General Lingan pervaded Montgomery and other parts of the state. The mangled corpse of this general had been thrown out of prison on the earth, where it lay exposed till the middle of the next day, when it was obtained and buried by a relative. Many of the citizens put on mourning for him, declaring they would not lay it aside until his death was properly avenged.

At this time Johnson, the Mayor of Baltimore, issued a proclamation in the *Bonaparte*an style, threatening, "summarily to punish the riotous and ill-disposed." The following interesting extract of a letter from A. C. Hanson, dated near Baltimore, August 3, will best convey to the reader's conception the then distracted state of affairs:—

"Next to the death of General Lingan, whose exit was noble and truly characteristic, the panic prevailing among the federalists, in and near Baltimore, has smitten my heart more severely than all the wrongs and sufferings inflicted by the blind and ferocious agents of malignant, cowardly, blood-thirsty enemies, sheltering themselves for a time behind an irresponsible banditti.—My wounds, it is true, are numerous and severe, but they reach not my mind, nor give a moment's uneasiness or grief, but the gloom and despondency pervading the body of federalists within the sphere of Baltimore influence, inflame my very brain, and are as a thousand daggers aimed at my heart. The late scenes in the emporium of Maryland, originating demonstrably at Washington, and made by many a party question, I consider merely the commencement of a long series of struggles, to terminate happily or unfortunately for the country, as men of respectability, property, and talents, perform the parts assigned them by patriotism. If they look on quietly, or rather fly their posts, and permit a hundredth part of the population of any given place, and that too composed of pickpockets, footpads, foreign vagabonds, and privateersmen, to usurp the government, they may blame themselves when their property, persons, and families, are disposed of by the same rules of 'summary adjudication.'

"Of my friends and fellow-martyrs, when I say they would vie with the picked men of Leonidas, facts will attest the truth of the assertion. Although they had not slept for thirty-six hours, to the last moment, they were cheerful, conversable, and sometimes gay. Not even when the forcing of the jail-door was announced by the savage yell of the mob, nor when they came to the door of the apartment in which we were confined, was there a look, a whisper, or motion of the body, expressive of any thing but cool, collected courage, and contempt of death. A different conduct was not to be expected of men, who had embarked in such a cause, with a perfect knowledge of all the consequences, though they never could have anticipated being delivered over to the executioner, through the inhuman treachery of the civil authorities.

The liberty of the press, the security of property and person, the rights, civil and political, belonging to the meanest citizen, the very principles and privileges, for the assertion and defence of which the war of independence was declared, we had pledged ourselves to maintain, and at the risk of our lives, and at every extremity not forbidden by the laws. With the mob and civil authority united against us, the contest was indeed unequal.—However, my situation allows me to add but little.

"All my partners in persecution and suffering, whom I have seen or heard from since the massacre, agree in ascribing their injuries to the same men. The names of the mayor, General Stricker, and John Montgomery, are first on the catalogue of the perfidious, barbarous monsters; and it will appear, that the advice of the latter, dictated by cowardice, produced the catastrophe.

"My writing to you is more of an experiment than otherwise, and I cannot dictate, as no one will be my amanuensis, the doctors and nurses all uniting in their vows, that I shall not write or talk, and I can do neither without danger.

"I have six wounds on the head, either of which are sufficiently severe to induce an inflammation of the brain, without great care. Both collar-bones are hurt. The extremity of the spinal bone injured, and excessively painful. The breast bruised, and now painful. The fore-finger of the right hand broken, and the whole hand injured, having been twice stabbed, once through, with a pen-knife; and the nose broken.—These are the injuries I have received, but they do not give me half the pain that the despondency of my political friends inflicts."

CHAPTER VI.

Extracts from a Memorial addressed to the President of the United States.—List of American Privateers taken and destroyed by his Majesty's Vessels.—Ineffectual Attempts of Commodore Rodgers' upon the Belvidera.—Ridiculous Compliments paid to Captain Hull, for the Capture of La Guerriere.—Honorable Acquittal of Captain Ducrest.—Attack on Canada.—Gallantry of the English.—President's Message to Congress.

ABOUT 1,500 of the inhabitants of the county of Rockingham, in New Hampshire, addressed a memorial to the President of the United States on the 5th of August, from which the following are extracts:—

"We have witnessed, with sincere and deep regret, a system of policy pursued by the general government, from the embargo of 1807 to the present time, tending most obviously, in our view, to the destruction of the commerce of these states.

"The alarm excited in our minds by the favorite and long-continued 'Restrictive System,' is raised still higher by the late declaration of war against Great Britain; an event which, we believe, in the present defenceless circumstances of the country, will be productive of evils of incalculable magnitude.

"The impressment of our seamen, which forms the most plausible and popular of the alleged causes of war, we believe to have been the subject of great misrepresentation. The number of these cases has been extravagantly exaggerated. Every inquiry on the subject strengthens our conviction, that the reputed number bear little relation to the true number. We are among those to whom instances of impressment, if they did actually exist to any considerable extent, must be known; yet we cannot find them out. Some of the members of this meeting have been constantly employed in commercial pursuits, and have had ships on the ocean from the peace of 1783, until the ocean became unnavigable, as to us, by the embargo of 1807; and yet, during all that time, have never suffered the loss of one native American seaman by impressment. Other members of this meeting have, as masters of vessels, long inhabited, as it were, on the seas, and have been visited hundreds of times by British ships of war, and never had an American seaman taken from them by impressment.

"If so many of our seafaring fellow-citizens were actually in bondage, they must have been taken from the inhabitants of the Atlantic coast. They would be from among our brethren, sons, relations, and friends.

"It is well worthy of notice, that the greatest apparent feeling on this subject of impressments, and the greatest disposition to wage war on that account, are entertained by the representatives of those states which have no seamen at all of their own; while those sections of the community, in which more than three-fourths of the mariners of the United States have their homes, are, by great majorities, against that war, among the professed objects of which, the release of impressed seamen forms so principal a figure.

"It is well known that England pretends to no right of impressing our seamen. She insists only that she has a right to the service of her own subjects, in time of war, even though found serving on-board the merchant-ships of other nations. This claim we suppose to be neither unfounded nor novel. It is recognized by the public law of Europe, and of the civilized world. Writers of the highest authority maintain, that the right belongs to all nations. For the same reason, say they, that the father of a family may demand the aid of his children to defend himself and his house, a nation may call home her subjects to her defence and protection in time of war.

"But if this were not so, is our nation to plunge into a ruinous war, in order to settle a question of relative right between the government of a foreign nation and the subjects of that government? Are we to fight the battles of British seamen?

Nay more—are we to espouse their cause, in opposition to the cause of our native mariners?

"Fatal, indeed, would it be to the important interests of the navigating states, if the consequence of this war should be, that the American flag shall give the American character to all who sail under it, and thus invite thousands of foreign seamen to enter into our service, and thrust aside our own native citizens.

"England has always professed a willingness to adjust this subject by amicable arrangement. She has repeatedly called on us to do our part towards effecting such adjustment. She has reminded us of the facility, we may say the falsity, with which American protections are obtained; of the frequent instances in which Irishmen, and even men that cannot speak a word of our language, are found with American protections in their pockets. She has expressly and officially offered to prohibit, by severe laws, all impressment from American vessels, if the American government would enact laws prohibiting American officers from granting protections or certificates of citizenship to British subjects. She has, also, through her minister, offered to restore every native seamen that our government could name, as being under impressment. For years preceding the declaration of war, our government has been, in a manner, silent on this subject. When the arrangement was made with Mr. Erskine, the present administration themselves did not consider any existing difficulties on the subject of impressment as insuperable obstacles to peace.

"The blockade, and orders in council,—the other causes of war, bear no better examination than the subject of impressment. The blockade, now so grievous to be endured, we know was regarded, at the time it was laid, as a measure favourable to our interest. We know this, upon the express declaration of Mr. Monroe, then our minister in England. We have his own words, that it would be regarded "in a favorable light," and that it "promised to be highly satisfactory to our commercial interests."

"By what train of reasoning this favor is now turned into an injury of such magnitude as to justify war, we are utterly at a loss to comprehend.

"We are equally unsatisfied with the arguments used, to prove that the decrees of France were repealed in November, 1810. Against such supposed repeal of the French decrees, we have the express declaration of the French government itself, as late as March, 1812, alleging that those decrees did then exist. We have also had daily evidence of their operation, in the destruction of our property; and some members of this meeting have convictions of the existence and operation of those decrees, down to the very moment of our declaration of war; which convictions being produced by great and repeated personal losses, in the seizures, detention, confiscation, and burnings, under those very decrees, are not likely to be removed, by any ingenious comments on the terms of an ambiguous, deceptive, and fallacious instrument like the Duke of Cadore's letter.

"The conduct of France, in relation to the repeal of her edicts, exhibits to our view a scene of the most contemptible fraud and juggling that ever disgraced the court of any nation.

"The British orders in council, we are informed, are now revoked. We cannot but lament, that the declaration of war was forced and hurried, as if to put us beyond the benefit of favorable events. Every attempt at postponement was ineffectual; and the question was taken, at a moment, when, perhaps, a month's delay would have removed the principal ground of complaint, and averted the awful calamity.

"But although we lament the present war, on all accounts, yet do we deprecate it most of all, as we view in it, as we fear, the harbinger of French alliance.

"On the subject of any French connection, either close or more remote, we have made up our minds. We will, in no event, assist in uniting the republic of America with the military despotism of France. We will have no connection with her principles or her power. If her armed troops, under whatever name or character, should come here, we shall regard them as enemies. No pressure, domestic or foreign, shall ever compel us to connect our interests with those of the house of Corsica; or to yoke ourselves to the triumphal car of the conqueror and the tyrant of Europe."

The following list of American privateers, taken and destroyed by his majesty's ships and vessels, on the Halifax station, between July 1 and August 25, was transmitted by Vice-admiral Sawyer to G. W. Croker, esq. in a letter bearing the latter date.

Active schooner, of two guns and twenty men, captured by the Spartan, Captain Brenton, 16th of July, 1812, off Cape Sable.

Fair Trader schooner, of one gun and twenty men, captured by the Indian, Captain Jane, and Plumper, Lieutenant Bray, 16th of July, 1812, Bay of Fundy.

Argus schooner, of one gun and twenty-three men, captured by the Plumper, Lieutenant Bray, 17th July, 1812, Bay of Fundy.

Friendship schooner, of one gun and eight men, captured by the Plumper, Lieutenant Bray, 18th of July, 1812, Bay of Fundy.

Actress sloop, of four guns and fifty-three men, captured by the Spartan, Captain Brenton, 18th of July, 1812, off Cape St. Mary.

Intention schooner, of one gun, three swivels, twenty-nine men, captured by the Spartan, Captain Brenton, 19th of July, 1812, off Annapolis.

64.

Gleaner sloop, of six guns, and forty men, captured by the Colibri, Captain Thompson, 23d of July, 1812, off Cape Sable.

Curlew brig, of sixteen guns, 172 men, and 270 tons, captured by the Acasta, Captain Kerr, 24th July, 1812, lat. 44. 15. N. long. 62. 30. W. pierced for twenty guns, off Cape Sable.

Catherine ship, of fourteen guns and eighty-eight men, captured by the Colibri, Captain Thompson, 26th of July, 1812, off Cape Sable.

Gossamer brig, of fourteen guns and 100 men, captured by the Emulous, Captain Mulcaster, 30th of July, 1812, off Cape Sable.

Morning Star schooner, of one gun, four swivels, fifty men, and seventy tons, captured by the Maidstone, Captain Burdet, and Spartan, Captain Brenton, 1st of August, 1812, Bay of Fundy; burnt by the boats in a creek called Bailly's Mistake.

Polly schooner, of one gun, four swivels, forty men, and sixty tons, captured by the Maidstone, Captain Burdet, and Spartan, Captain Brenton, 1st of August, 1812, Bay of Fundy; burnt by the boats in a creek called Bailly's Mistake.

Commodore Barry, a revenue-cutter, of six guns, pierced for ten guns, captured by the Maidstone, Captain Burdet, and Spartan, Captain Brenton, 3d of August, 1812, Bay of Fundy; attacked in Little River, and brought out by the boats; the chief part of the crew escaped.

Madison schooner, of two guns, captured by the Maidstone, Captain Burdet, and Spartan, Captain Brenton, 3d of August, 1812, Bay of Fundy; attacked in Little River, and brought out by the boats; the chief part of the crew escaped.

Olive schooner, of two guns, captured by the Maidstone, Captain Burdet, and Spartan, Captain Brenton, 3d of August, 1812, Bay of Fundy; attacked in Little River and brought out by the boats; the chief part of the crew escaped.

Spence schooner, of two guns, captured by the Maidstone, Captain Burdet, and Spartan, Captain Brenton, 3d of August, 1812, Bay of Fundy; attacked in Little River, and brought out by the boats; the chief part of the crew escaped.

Polly schooner, of four guns and thirty-five men, captured by the Colibri and Statera, 11th of August, 1812, entrance of Bay of Fundy.

Buckskin schooner, of one gun, three swivels, and thirty-two men, captured by the Colibri and Statera, 11th of August, 1812, off Cape Sable.

Dolphin schooner, of one gun, one swivel, and twenty-eight men, captured by the Earl Moira, tender to Guerriere, 12th of August, off Shelburne.

Regulator schooner, of one gun and forty men, captured by the Colibri, Captain Thomson, 12th of August, 1812, off Cape Sable.

Dolphin schooner, of two guns and forty-eight

11 B

BOOK XI.

CHAP. VI.

1812.

men, captured by the Colibri, and Maidstone, 13th of August, 1812, off Cape Sable.

Lewis schooner, of six guns and thirty men, captured by the Hope, tender to the Africa, 14th of August, 1812, off Halifax.

Pythagoras schooner, of three guns and thirty-five men, captured by the Bream, Lieutenant Timpson, 9th of August, 1812, off Shelburne, after an action of twenty-minutes; enemy had two men wounded.

Bunker's Hill schooner, of seven guns and seventy-two men, captured by the Belvidera, 21st of August, 1812, Sambro light-house, N. W. 242 miles.

Mr. Madison depended much upon the services of Commodore Rodgers, who, in the affair with the Little Belt, had proved himself a bitter enemy to Great Britain. He was appointed to cruise with several vessels under his command, but according to his own accounts, was unsuccessful in his attempts. We shall subjoin the commodore's letter to the secretary of the navy, and an extract from his journal.

"United States Frigate President, Boston, September 1, 1812.

"Sir,—I had the honor yesterday of informing you of the arrival of the squadron, and have now to state the result and particulars of our cruise.

"Previous to leaving New York on the 21st of June, I heard that a British convoy had sailed from Jamaica for England, on or about the 20th of the preceding month; and on being informed of the declaration of war against Great Britain, I determined, in the event of Commodore Decatur joining me with the United States, Congress, and Argus, as you had directed, to go in pursuit of them. The United States, Congress, and Argus, did join me on the 21st; with which vessels, this ship, and the Hornet, I accordingly sailed in less than an hour after I received your orders of the 18th of June, accompanied by your official communication of the declaration of war.

"On leaving New York I shaped our course south-easterly; in the expectation of falling in with vessels, by which I should hear of the before-mentioned convoy, and the following night met with an American brig, which gave me the sought-for information. The squadron now crowded sail in pursuit; but, the next morning, was taken out of its course by the pursuit of a British frigate, that I since find was the Belvidera, relative to which I beg leave to refer you to the enclosed extract from my journal. After repairing, as far as possible, the injury done by the Belvidera to our spars and rigging, we again crowded all sail, and resumed our course in pursuit of the convoy, but did not receive farther intelligence of it until the 29th of June, on the western edge of the Bank of Newfoundland, where we spoke an American schooner, the master of which reported, that he had two days before passed them, in lat. 43. long. 55. steering to the eastward. I was surprised to find that the convoy was still so far to the eastward of us, but was urged, however, as well by what I considered my duty, as by inclination, to continue the pursuit. On the 1st of July, a little to the eastward of Newfoundland Bank, we fell in with quantities of cocoa-nut shells, orange-peels, &c. which indicated that the convoy were not far distant, and we pursued it with zeal, although frequently taken out of our course by vessels it was necessary to chase, without gaining any farther intelligence until the 9th of July, in lat. 45. 30. long. 23. we captured the British private armed brig Dolphin, of Jersey, and was informed by some of her crew that they had seen the convoy the preceding evening; the weather was not clear at the time, but that they had counted thirty-five sail; and that the force charged with its protection consisted of one two-decker, a frigate, a sloop of war, and a brig. This was the last intelligence I received of the before-mentioned convoy, although its pursuit was continued until the 13th of July, being then within eighteen and twenty hours sail of the British channel.

"From this we steered for the island of Madeira, passed close by it on the 21st of July; thence near the Azores, and saw Corvo and Flores; thence steered for the Banks of Newfoundland; and from the latter place (by the way of Cape Sable) to this port, it having become indispensably necessary, by the time we reached our own coast, to make the first convenient port in the United States, owing, I am sorry to say, to that wretched disease, the scurvy, having made its appearance on-board of the vessels, most generally to a degree seriously alarming.

"From the western part of the banks of Newfoundland, to our making the island of Madeira, the weather was such, at least six days out of seven, as to obscure from our discovery every object that we did not pass within four or five miles of; and indeed, for several days together, the fog was so thick as to prevent our seeing each other, even at cable's length asunder, more than twice or thrice in the twenty-four hours.

"From the time of our leaving the United States until our arrival here, we chased every vessel we saw; and you will not be a little astonished when I inform you, that, although we brought to every thing we did chase, with the exception of four vessels, we only made seven captures, and one recapture.

"It is truly an unpleasant task to be obliged to make a communication thus barren of benefit to our country; the only consolation I individually feel on the occasion being derived from knowing, that our being at sea obliged the enemy to concentrate a considerable portion of his most active force, and thereby prevented his capturing an incalculable amount of American property, that would otherwise have fallen a sacrifice.

"I am aware of the anxiety you must have experienced at not hearing from me for such a length of time; but this, I am sure, you will not attribute in any degree to neglect, when I inform you, that not a single proper opportunity occurred, from the time of leaving the United States until our return.

"The four vessels we chased, and did not come up with, were—the Belvidera; a small pilot-boat schooner, supposed to be an American privateer; the hermaphrodite-brig privateer Yankee, which we lost sight of in a fog, but whose character we afterwards learnt; and a frigate, supposed to be British, which we chased on the 28th ult. near the shoal of George's Bank, and should certainly have come up with, had we have had the advantage of two hours more day-light.

"On-board of the several vessels of the squadron, there are between 80 and 100 prisoners, taken from the vessels we captured during our late cruise. The government not having any agent for prisoners here, I shall send them to Commodore Bainbridge, to be disposed of in such manner as best appears with the interest of the United States, and which, I hope, may meet your approbation.—With great respect,

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"JOHN RODGERS.

"The Hon. Paul Hamilton, Secretary of the Navy, Washington."

"List of Vessels captured, re-captured, and destroyed."

"July 2.—Brig Traveller, 277 tons, J. Amory, master, of Newcastle, E. ten men, bound from the Bay of Fundy, owned by Geo. Watson, Mat. Dunn, Geo. Dunn, and John Stoker; cargo of timber—burnt.

"July 4.—Brig Duchess of Portland, six guns, eleven men, of Newcastle, E. bound to Newcastle N. in ballast—burnt.

"July 9.—Brig Dolphin, 241 tons, twelve guns, and twenty-three men, Philip Cobbet, of Jersey, England, bound from Jersey to Newfoundland, in ballast, and some cargo, owned by Winter and Nicoll—sent into the United States.

"July 24.—Ship John, of Lancaster, sixteen guns, and thirty men, bound from London to Martinique, in ballast—sent into the United States.

"Aug. 2.—Brig Argo, 165 tons, ten guns, and sixteen men, Wm. Middleton, master, of London, laden with cotton, fustic, and about 8,000 dollars in gold—ordered for the United States.

"Aug. 17.—Schooner Adeline, of London, ten men, bound from Hayti to London, laden with coffee—ordered for the United States.

"Aug. 25.—Schooner Betsey, of Marblehead, from Naples, laden with honey, recaptured from the Guerriere, who had ordered her for Halifax; four men and a midshipman (prize-master)—ordered her for the United States.

"JOHN RODGERS."

After describing the first ineffectual attempts of the President upon the Belvidera, the American commander thus proceeded in his journal:—

"I now endeavoured, by altering course half a point to port, and wetting our sails, to gain a more effectual position on his starboard quarter, but soon found myself losing ground. After this, a similar attempt was made at his larboard quarter, but without any better success, as the wind, at this time, was very light, and both ships sailing so nearly alike, that by making an angle of only half a point from the course she steered, enabled him to augment his distance. No hope was now left of bringing him to close action, except that derived from being to windward, and the expectation that the breeze might favor us first: I accordingly gave orders to steer directly after him, and to keep our bow-chace guns playing on his spars and rigging, until our broadside would more effectually reach him. At five, finding from the advantage his stern-guns gave him, that he had done considerable injury to our sails and rigging, and being within point-blank shot, I gave orders to put our helm to starboard, and fire our main-deck guns. This broadside did some further damage to his rigging, and I could perceive that his fore-topsail yard was wounded; but the sea was so very smooth, and the wind so light, that the injury done was not such as materially to affect his sailing. After this broadside, our course was instantly renewed in his wake (under a galling fire from his stern-chase guns, directed at our spars and rigging), and continued until half-past six; at which time, being within reach of his grape, and finding our sails, rigging, and several spars, particularly the main-yard (which had little left to support it, except the lifts and braces), very much disabled, I again gave orders to lull across his stern, and give him a couple of broadsides.

"The enemy, at this time, finding himself so hardly pressed, and seeing, while in the act of firing, our head-sails to left, and supposing that the ship had, in a measure, lost the effect of her helm, he gave a broad yawl, with the intention of bringing his broadside to bear. Finding the President answered the helm too quick for his purpose, he immediately re-assumed his course, and precipitately fired his four after main-deck guns, on the starboard side, although they did not bear upon us at the time by twenty-five to thirty degrees, and he now commenced lightening his ship, by throwing overboard all his boats, waste anchors, &c. and by this means was enabled, by a quarter before seven, to get so far a-head as to prevent our bow-chase guns doing execution; and I now perceived, with more mortification than words can express, that there was little or no chance left of getting within gun-shot of the enemy again. Under every disadvantage of disabled spars, sails, and rigging, I, however, continued the chase with all the sail we could set, till half-past eleven, p. m.; when, perceiving he had gained upwards of three miles, and not the slightest prospect left of coming up with him, I gave up the pursuit, and made the signal to the other ships, as they came up, to do the same.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. VI.

1812.

"During the first of the chase, while the breeze was fresh, and sailing by the wind, I thought the whole of the squadron gained upon the enemy. It was soon discoverable, however, the advantage he acquired by sailing large, and this, I conceive, he must have derived, in so great a degree, by starting his water, as I could perceive, upwards of an hour before we came within gun-shot, water running out of his scuppers.

"While in chase, it was difficult to determine whether our own situation, or that of the other vessels of the squadron, was the most unpleasant. The superior sailing of the President was not such (off the wind), as to enable us to get upon the broadside of the enemy; the situation of the others was not less irksome, as not even the headmost, which was the Congress, was able, at any time, to get within less than two gun-shots distant, and even at that but for a very little time.

"In endeavouring to get alongside of the enemy, the following persons were killed and wounded: sixteen of whom were killed and wounded by the bursting of our own gun."

[Here follow the names of the killed and wounded, being in all three killed, and nineteen wounded; among the latter was Commodore Rodgers himself.]

In consequence of the capture of his majesty's ship La Guerriere, great honors were paid to Captain Hull, who was hailed as a Lord Nelson: pieces of plate were voted to him, public dinners given in celebration of him, addresses of thanks presented to him, and songs of triumph composed upon him; the battle was represented at the American theatres; and his portrait, by Stuart, exhibited for money.

On the 2d of October, a court-martial was held on-board his majesty's ship Africa, at Halifax, for the trial of Captain Dacres, and the surviving officers and crew of his majesty's late ship La Guerriere, for the surrender of that ship to the United States frigate Constitution, on the 19th of August: Vice-admiral Sawyer, president; Captain Sir J. P. Beresford, vice-president; B. Broke, J. Bastard, and C. Gill, members.—After a mature consideration, the court came to the following opinion:—

"That the surrender of the Guerriere was proper, in order to preserve the lives of her remaining crew, and that her being in that lamentable situation was from the accident of her masts going, which was occasioned more by their defective state, than from the fire of the enemy, though so greatly superior in guns and men. The court do, therefore, unanimously and honorably acquit the said Captain Dacres, the officers and crew of his majesty's late ship La Guerriere, and they are hereby honorably acquitted accordingly.

"The court, at the same time, feel themselves called upon to express the high sense they entertain of the conduct of the ship's company in general, when prisoners, but more particularly of those who withstood the attempts made to shake their loyalty, by offering them high bribes to enter into the land and sea-service of the enemy, and they will represent their merits to the commander-in-chief?"

Admiral Sir John Thomas Duckworth, commander-in-chief of his majesty's ships and vessels at Newfoundland, transmitted to J. W. Croker, esq. a list of thirty-three American vessels detained, and two English vessels (taken by American privateers) recaptured by the squadron under his command.

The American schooner Providence was captured, September 12, by his majesty's ship Domonica.

His majesty's forces, aided by the militia and Indians, stationed on the Niagara frontier, completely repelled an attempt of the Americans to invade Upper Canada, and took 900 of the enemy's army. Their commander, Brigadier-general Wadsworth, surrendered himself on the field of battle, to Major-general Sheaffe. The gallant Major-general Brock fell early, at the head of the flank companies of the 49th regiment, while nobly encouraging them to sustain their position, in opposition to an infinitely superior force, until the reinforcements he had ordered to advance to their support should arrive. The following was Major-general Sheaffe's account of this battle:—

"Fort George, Oct. 18.

"Sir,—I have the honor of informing your excellency, that the enemy made an attack, with a considerable force, this morning before day-light, on the position of Queenstown. On receiving intelligence of it, Major-general Brock immediately proceeded to that post, and I am excessively grieved in having to add, that he fell whilst gallantly cheering his troops to an exertion for maintaining it. With him the position soon was lost;

but the enemy was not allowed to retain it long. Reinforcements having been sent up from his post, composed of regular troops, militia and Indians, a movement was made to turn his left, while some artillery, under the able direction of Captain Wolcroft, supported by a body of infantry, engaged his attention in front. This operation was aided too by the judicious position which Norton, and the Indians with him, had taken on the woody brow of the high ground above Queenstown. A communication being thus opened with Chipawa, a junction was formed with succours that had been ordered from that post. The enemy was then attacked, and after a short but spirited conflict, was completely defeated. I had the satisfaction of receiving the sword of their commander, Brigadier-general Wadsworth, on the field-of-battle; and many officers, with upwards of 900 men, were made prisoners, and more may yet be expected. A stand of colours, and one six-pounder, were also taken. The action did not terminate till nearly three o'clock in the afternoon, and their loss in killed and wounded must have been considerable. Ours I believe to be comparatively small in numbers; no officer was killed besides Major-general Brock, one of the most gallant and zealous officers in his majesty's service, whose loss cannot be too much deplored; and Lieutenant-colonel Mac Donell, provincial aid-de-camp, whose gallantry and merit rendered him worthy of his chief.

"Captains Dennis and Williams, commanding the flank companies of the 49th regiment, which were stationed at Queenstown, were wounded, bravely contending at the head of their men, against superior numbers; but I am glad to have it in my power to add, that Captain Dennis fortunately was able to keep the field, though with pain and difficulty; and Captain Williams's wound is not likely to deprive me long of his services.

"I am particularly indebted to Captain Holcroft, of the royal-artillery, for his judicious and skilful co-operation with the guns and howitzers under his immediate superintendence; the well-directed fire from which contributed materially to the fortunate results of the day.

"Captain Derinzy, of the 41st regiment, brought up the reinforcement of that corps from Fort George, and Captain Bullock led that of the same regiment from Chipawa; and under their command those detachments acquitted themselves in such a manner, as to sustain the reputation which the 41st regiment had already acquired in the vicinity of Detroit.

"Major-general Brock, soon after his arrival at Queenstown, had sent down orders for battering the American fort Niagara; Brigadier-general

Major Evans, who was left in charge of Fort George, directed the operations against it with so much effect as to silence its fire, and to force the troops to abandon it; and by its prudent precautions he prevented mischief of a most serious nature, which otherwise might have been effected, the enemy having used heated shot in firing at Fort George. In these services he was most effectually aided by Colonel Clans, (who remained in the fort at my desire,) and by Captain Vigoreux, of the royal engineers. Brigadier-major Evans also mentions the conduct of Captains Powell and Cameron, of the militia artillery, in terms of commendation.

"Lieutenant Crowther, of the 41st regiment, had charge of two three-pounders that had accompanied the movement of our little corps, and they were employed with very good effect.

"Captain Clegg, of the 49th regiment, aid-de-camp to our lamented friend and general, afforded me most essential assistance; and I found the services of Lieutenant Fowlers, of the 41st regiment, assistant deputy quarter-master-general, very useful. I derived much aid too from the activity and intelligence of Lieutenant Kerr, of the Glencary fencibles, whom I employed in communicating with the Indians and other flanking parties.

"I was unfortunately deprived of the aid, experience, and ability of Lieutenant-colonel Myers, deputy quarter-master-general, who had been sent up to Fort Erie a few days before, on duty which detained him there.

"Lieutenant-colonels Butler and Clarke, of the militia, and Captains Hatt, Durand, Rowe, Applegarth, James Crooks, Cooper, Robert Hamilton, Mac Ewen, and Duncan Cameron, and Lieutenants Richardson, and Thomas Butler, commanding flank companies of the Lincoln and York militia, led their men into action with great spirit. Major Merritt, commanding the Niagara dragoons, accompanied me and gave me much assistance with part of his corps. Captain A. Hamilton, belonging to it, was disabled from riding, and attached himself to the guns under Captain Holcroft, who speaks highly of his activity and usefulness. I beg leave to add, that volunteers Shaw, Thomson, and Jarvis, attached to the flank companies of the 49th regiment, conducted themselves with great spirit; the first wounded, and the last taken prisoner; I beg leave to recommend these young men to your excellency's notice. Norton is wounded, but not badly; he and the Indians particularly distinguished themselves, and I have very great satisfaction in assuring your excellency, that the spirit and good conduct of his majesty's troops, of the militia and of the other provincial corps, were eminently conspicuous on this occasion.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. VI.

1812.

"I have not been able to ascertain yet the number of our troops or of those of the enemy engaged; ours, I believe, did not exceed the number of the prisoners we have taken; and their advance, which effected a landing, probably amounted to 1,300 or 1,400 men.

"I shall do myself the honor of transmitting to your excellency further details, when I shall have received the several reports of the occurrences which did not pass under my own observation, with the return of the casualties, and those of the killed and wounded, and of the ordnance taken.

"I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) "R. H. SHEAFFE, major-general.
"To his Excellency Sir G. Prevost, Bart. &c."

Major-general Roger Hall Sheaffe was appointed to the command of the troops in the upper province, and to administer the civil government of the same. He humanely consented to a cessation of offensive hostility, on the solicitation of Major-general Van Ranseller, for the purpose of allowing the Americans to remove the bodies of the slain and wounded.

It was stated, by private accounts, that the Americans who crossed over in the night, consisted of about 1,500 men: the whole of whom were killed, wounded, or taken prisoners; and about 500 more, who attempted to cross afterwards, were drowned. The total numbers engaged on the side of the English, did not exceed 700 men, and their loss was not more than fifty killed and wounded. Major-general Sir Isaac Brock was a native of Guernsey.

On the opening of the imperial parliament, November 30, the prince-regent in his speech thus alluded to this victory:

"The declaration of war by the government of the United States of America, was made under circumstances which might have afforded a reasonable expectation, that the amicable relations between the two nations would not long be interrupted. It is with sincere regret that I am obliged to acquaint you, that the conduct and pretensions of that government have hitherto prevented the conclusion of any pacific arrangement. Their measures of hostility have been principally directed against the adjoining British provinces, and every effort has been made to seduce the inhabitants of them from their allegiance to his majesty. The proofs, however, which I have received of loyalty and attachment from his majesty's subjects in North America, are highly satisfactory. The attempts of the enemy to invade Upper Canada have not only proved abortive, but, by the judicious arrangements of the governor-general, and by the skill and decision with which the military operations have been conducted, the forces of the enemy assembled for that purpose in one quarter have been compelled to capitulate, and in another have been completely defeated."

On the 4th of November, the President of the United States had communicated the following message to the congress:

"Fellow-citizens of the senate and house of representatives,—On our present meeting, it is my first duty to invite your attention to the providential favors which our country has experienced in the unusual degree of health dispensed to its inhabitants, and in the rich abundance with which the earth has rewarded the labours bestowed on it. In the successful cultivation of other branches of industry, and in the progress of general improvement favorable to the national prosperity, there is just occasion also for our mutual congratulations and thankfulness.

"With these blessings are naturally mingled the pressures and vicissitudes incidental to the state of war, into which the United States have been forced by the perseverance of a foreign power, in its system of injustice and aggression. Previous to its declaration, it was deemed proper, as a measure of precaution and forecast, that a considerable force should be placed in the Michigan territory, with a general view to its security; and, in the event of war, to such operations in the uppermost Canada as would intercept the hostile influence of Great Britain over the savages; obtain the command of the lake, on which that part of Canada borders; and maintain co-operating relations with such forces as might be most conveniently employed against other parts.

"Brigadier-general Hull was charged with this provisional service, having under his command a body of troops, composed of regulars and of volunteers from the state of Ohio: having reached his destination, after his knowledge of the war, and possessing discretionary authority to act offensively, he passed into the neighbouring territory of the enemy, with a prospect of an easy and victorious progress. The expedition, nevertheless, terminated unfortunately, not only in a retreat to the town and fort of Detroit, but in the surrender of both, and of the gallant corps commanded by that officer. The causes of this painful reverse will be investigated by a military tribunal. A distinguishing feature in the operations which preceded and followed this adverse event, is the use made by the enemy of the merciless savages under their influence. Whilst the benevolent policy of the United States invariably recommended peace, and promoted civilization amongst that wretched portion of the human race, and was making exertions to dissuade them from taking either side in the war, the enemy has not scrupled to call to his aid their ruthless ferocity, armed with the horrors of those instruments of carnage and torture which are known to spare neither age nor sex. In this outrage against the laws of honorable war, and against the feelings sacred to humanity, the British commanders cannot resort to a plan of retaliation; for it is committed in the face of our example. They cannot mitigate it by calling it a self-defence against men in arms, for it embraces the most shocking butcheries of defenceless families; nor can it be pretended that they are not answerable for the atrocities perpetrated, since the savages are employed with the knowledge, and even with menaces, that their fury could not be controuled. Such is the spectacle which the deputed authorities of a nation, boasting its religion and morality, have not been restrained from presenting to an enlightened age.

"The misfortune at Detroit was not, however, without a consoling effect. It was followed by signal proofs, that the national spirit rises according to the pressure on it. The loss of an important post, and of the brave men surrendered with it, inspired every where new ardour and determination. In the states and districts least remote, it was no sooner known, than every citizen was eager to fly with his arms at once to protect his brethren against the blood-thirsty savages let loose by the enemy on an extensive frontier; and to convert a partial calamity into a source of invigorated efforts. This patriotic zeal, which it was necessary rather to limit than excite, has embodied an ample force from the states of Kentucky and Ohio, and from parts of Pennsylvania and Virginia. It is placed, with the addition of a few regulars, under the command of Brigadier-general Harrison, who possesses the entire confidence of his fellow-soldiers; among whom are citizens,—some of them volunteers in the ranks,—not less distinguished by their political stations than by their personal merits.

"The greater portion of this force is proceeding on its destination towards the Michigan territory, having succeeded in relieving an important frontier post, and in several incidental operations against hostile tribes of savages, rendered indispensable by the subserviency into which they had been seduced by the enemy; a seduction the more cruel, as it could not fail to impose a necessity of precautionary severities against those who yielded to it.

"At a recent date, an attack was made on a post of the enemy, near Niagara, by a detachment of the regular and other forces, under the command of Major-general Van Rensselaer, of the militia of the State of New York. The attack, it appears, was ordered in compliance with the ardour of the troops, who executed it with distinguished gallantry, and were for a time victorious; but not receiving the expected support, they were compelled to yield to reinforcements of British regulars and savages. Our loss has been considerable, and is deeply to be lamented. That of the enemy, less ascertained, will be the more self, as it includes among the killed the commanding-general, who was also governor of the province; and was sustained by veteran troops, from inexperienced soldiers, who must daily improve in the duties of the field.

"Our expectation of gaining the command of the Lakes, by the invasion of Canada, from Detroit, having been disappointed, measures were instantly taken to provide on them a naval force superior to that of the enemy. From the talents and activity of the officer charged with this object, every thing that can be done may be expected. Should the present season not admit of complete success, the progress made will ensure for the next a naval ascendancy, where it is essential, to a permanent peace with, and a controul over the savages.

"Among the incidents to the measures of the war, I am constrained to advert to the refusal of the governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut, to furnish the required detachments of militia towards the defence of the maritime frontier. The refusal was founded on a novel and unfortunate exposition of the provisions of the constitution relating to the militia. The correspondence, which will be before you, contain the requisite information on the subject. It is obvious, that if the authority of the United States, to call into service and command the militia for the public defence can be thus frustrated, even in a state of declared war, and of course under apprehensions of invasion preceding war, they are not one nation for the purpose most of all requiring it, and that the public safety may have no other resource than those large and permanent military establishments which are forbidden by the principles of our free government, and against the necessity of which the militia were meant to be a constitutional bulwark.

"On the coasts, and on the ocean, the war has been as successful as circumstances, inseparable from its early stages, could promise. Our public ships and private cruizers, by their activity, and, where there was occasion, by their intrepidity, have made the enemy sensible of the difference between a reciprocity of captures, and the long confinement of them to their side. Our trade, with little exception, has safely reached our ports, having been much favored in it by the course pursued by a squadron of our frigates, under the command of Commodore Rodgers; and in the instance in which skill and bravery were more particularly tried with those of the enemy, the American flag had an auspicious triumph. The frigate Constitution, commanded by Captain Hull, after a close and short engagement, completely disabled and captured a British frigate; gaining for that officer, and all on-board, a praise which cannot be too liberally bestowed—not merely for the victory actually achieved, but for that prompt and cool exertion of commanding talents, which, giving to courage its highest character, and to the force applied its full effect, proved that more could have been done in a contest requiring more.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. VI.

1812.

"Anxious to abridge the evils from which a state of war cannot be exempt, I lost no time, after it was declared, in conveying to the British government the terms on which its progress might be arrested, without waiting the delays of a formal and final pacification: and our chargé d'affaires at London was, at the same time, authorised to agree to an armistice, founded upon them. These terms required, that the orders in council should be repealed, as they affected the United States, without a revival of the blockades, violating acknowledged rules; that there should be an immediate discharge of American seamen from British ships, and a stop to impressments from American ships, with an understanding that an exclusion of the seamen of each nation, from the ships of the other, should be stipulated; and that the armistice should be improved into a definitive and comprehensive adjustment of depending controversies.

"Although a repeal of the orders, susceptible of explanations meeting the views of this government, had taken place before this pacific advance was communicated to that of Great Britain, the advance was declined, from an avowed repugnance to a suspension of the practice of impressment during the armistice, and without any intimation that the arrangement proposed, with respect to seamen, would be accepted. Whether the subsequent communications from this government, affording an occasion for reconsidering the subject, on the part of Great Britain, will be viewed in a more favorable light, or received in a more accommodating spirit, remains to be known. It would be unwise to release our measures, in any respect, on a presumption of such a result.

"The documents from the department of state, which relate to this subject, will give a view also of the propositions for an armistice, which have been received here,—one of them from the authorities at Halifax and in Canada; the other from the British government itself, through Admiral Warren; and of the grounds upon which neither of them could be accepted.

"Our affairs with France retain the posture which they held at my last communication to you.

"Notwithstanding the authorised expectation of an early as well as favorable issue of the discussions on foot, these have been procrastinated to the latest date. The only intervening occurrence meriting attention, is the promulgation of a French decree, purporting to be a definitive repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees. This proceeding, although made the ground of the repeal of the British orders in council, is rendered, by the time and manner of it, liable to many objections.

"The final communications from our special minister to Denmark, afford further proofs of the good effects of his mission, and of the amicable disposition of the Danish government. From Russia we have the satisfaction to receive assurances of continued friendship, and that it will not be affected by the rupture between the United States and Great Britain. Sweden, also, professes sentiments favorable to subsisting harmony.

"With the Barbary powers, excepting that of Algiers, our affairs remain on the ordinary footing. The consul-general residing with that regency has suddenly, and without cause, been banished, together with all the American citizens found there. Whether this was the transitory effect of capricious despotism, or the first act of predetermined hostility, is not ascertained. Precautions were taken by the consul on the latter supposition.

"The Indian tribes, not under foreign instigations, remain at peace, and receive the civilising attentions which have proved so beneficial to them.

"With a view to that vigorous prosecution of the war, to which our national faculties are adequate, the attention of congress will be particularly drawn to the insufficiency of the existing provisions for filling up the military establishment. Such is the happy condition of our country, arising from the facility of subsistence, and the high wages for every species of occupation, that notwithstanding the augmented inducements provided at the last session, a partial success only has attended the recruiting service. The deficiency has been necessarily supplied, during the campaign, by other than regular troops, with all the inconveniences and expences incident to them. The remedy lies in establishing more favorably, for the private soldier, the proportion between his recompence, and the term of his enlistment: and it is a subject which cannot too soon, or too seriously, be taken into consideration. The same insufficiency has been experienced in the provisions for volunteers, made by an act of the last session. The recompence for the service required in this case, is still less attractive than in the other; and although patriotism alone has sent into the field some valuable corps of that description, those alone, who can afford the sacrifice, can reasonably be expected to yield to the impulse. It will merit consideration also, whether, as auxiliary to the security of our frontier, corps may not be advantageously organized, with a restriction of their services to particular districts convenient to them; and whether the local or occasional services of marines, or others in the seaport towns, under a similar organization, would not be a proper addition to the means of their defence. I recommend a provision for an increase of the general-officers of the army, the deficiency of which has been illustrated by the number and distance of separate commands, which the cause of the war and the advantage of the service have required: and I cannot press too strongly on the earliest attention of the legislature, the importance of the reorganization of the staff-establishment, with a view to render more distinct and definite the relations and responsibilities of its several departments: that there is room for improvements, which will materially promote both economy and success, in what appertains to the army and the war, is equally inculcated by the examples of other countries, and by the experience of our own.

"A revision of the militia-laws, for the purpose of rendering them more systematic, and better adapting them to emergencies of the war, is at this time particularly desirable. Of the additional ships, authorised to be fitted for service, two will be shortly ready to sail; a third is under repair, and delay will be avoided in the repair of the residue. Of the appropriations for the purchase of materials for ship-building, the greater part has been applied to that object, and the purchases will be continued with the balance. The enterprising spirit which has characterized our naval force, and its success, both in restraining insults and depredations on our coasts, and in reprisals on the enemy, will not fail to recommend an enlargement upon it.

"There being reason to believe that the act, prohibiting the acceptance of British licenses, is not a sufficient guard against the use of them, for purposes favorable to the interests and views of the enemy, further provisions on that subject are highly important. Nor is it less so, that penal enactments should be provided for cases of corrupt and perfidious intercourse with the enemy, not amounting to treason, nor yet embraced by any statutory provisions.

"A considerable number of American vessels, which were in England when the revocation of the orders in council took place, were laden with British manufactures, under an erroneous impression that the non-importation act would immediately cease to operate, have arrived in the United States. It did not appear proper to exercise, on unforeseen cases of such magnitude, the ordinary powers vested in the treasury department, to mitigate forfeitures, without previously affording congress an opportunity of making on the subject such provisions as they may think proper. In their decisions they will, doubtless, equally consult what is due to equitable considerations, and to the public interest.

"The receipts in the treasury, during the year ending on the 30th of September last, have exceeded sixteen millions and an half of dollars; which have been sufficient to defray all the demands on the treasury to that day, including a necessary reimbursement of near three millions of the principal of the public debt. In these receipts are included a sum of near 8,850,000, received on account of the loans, authorised by the acts of last session. The whole sum actually obtained on loan, amounts to eleven millions of dollars: the residue of which being receivable subsequent to the 30th of September, will, together with the current revenue, enable us to defray all the expences of this year.

"The duties on the late unexpected importations of British manufactures, will render the revenue of the ensuing year more productive than could have been anticipated. The situation of our country, fellow-citizens, is not without its difficulties, though it abounds in animating considerations, of which the view here presented of our pecuniary resources is an example. With more than one nation we have serious and unsettled controversies,—and with one powerful in the means and habits of war, we are at war. The spirit and strength of this nation are, nevertheless, equal to the support of all its rights, and to carry it through all its trials. They can be met in that confidence. Above all, we have the inestimable consolation of knowing, that the war in which we are actually engaged, is a war neither of ambition nor vain-glory; that it is waged, not in violation of the rights of others, but in the maintenance of our own; that it was preceded by a patience without example, under wrongs accumulating without end; and that it was, finally, not declared, until every hope of averting it was extinguished, by the transfer of the British sceptres into new hands, clinging to former councils, and until declarations were reiterated, in the last hour, through the British envoy here, that the hostile edicts against our commercial rights, and our maritime independence, would not be revoked; nay, that they could not be revoked, without violating the obligations of Great Britain to other powers, as well as to her own interests. To have shrunk, under such circumstances, from manly resistance, would have been a degradation, blasting our best and proudest hopes. It would have struck us from the high rank where the virtuous struggles of our fathers had placed us, and have betrayed the magnificent legacy which we hold in trust for future generations. It would have acknowledged, that on the element which forms three-fourths of the globe we inhabit, and where all independent nations have equal and common rights, the American people were not an independent people, but colonists and vassals!

"It was at this moment, and with such an alternative, that war was chosen. The nation felt the necessity of it, and called for it. The appeal was accordingly made, in a just cause, to the just and powerful Being who holds in his hands the chain of events, and the destiny of nations. It remains only, that faithful to ourselves, entangled with no connections with the views of other powers, and ever ready to accept peace from the hand of justice, we prosecute that war with united council, and with the ample faculties of the nation, until peace be so obtained, and as the only means, under the divine blessing, of speedily obtaining it.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. VI.

1812.

"JAMES MADISON."

CHAPTER VII.

An Indian Town destroyed.—His Royal Highness the Prince-regent's Declaration in answer to the American Manifesto, relative to the War between Great Britain and the United States.—Madison re-elected President.—His Speech.

A DETACHMENT from General Hopkins's army, under Colonel Russell, of the 7th United States' regiment, succeeded in surprising one of the Poria towns. With 400 men, the colonel, by rapid marches, approached the town, shot a straggling Indian, assailed and carried the town. It was defended by about 150 warriors, who left twenty-five dead, and who fled to a swamp where their squaws and children had previously secreted themselves. The Americans took four prisoners, sixty horses laden with the baggage of the Indians, and seven scalps which were taken in September, near fort Harrison. The town and every thing in it was destroyed, which could not be brought away, and among it several Indians who had been wounded during the fall. Seven hundred Indians of the neighbouring towns had marched to meet General Hopkins, leaving the above 150 in charge of the women and children. The Marshal of the United States, for the district of South Carolina, had detained in custody twelve British subjects as hostages for the lives of six American seamen, who had been taken out of the privateer Sarah Ann, at Nassau, New Providence, and sent to Jamaica to be tried for treason.

The following declaration of the prince-regent, in answer to the American manifesto, relative to the war between Great Britain and the United States, appeared in a supplement to the London Gazette, January 9, 1813.

"The earnest endeavours of the prince-regent to preserve the relations of peace and amity with the United States of America having unfortunately failed, his royal highness, acting in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, deems it proper publicly to declare the causes and origin of the war, in which the government of the United States have compelled him to engage.

"No desire of conquest, or other ordinary motive of aggression, has been, or can be, with any colour of reason, in this case imputed to Great Britain. That her commercial interests were on the side of peace, if war could have been avoided without the sacrifice of her maritime rights, or without an injurious submission to France, is a truth which the American government will not deny.

"His royal highness does not, however, mean to rest on the favorable presumption to which he is entitled. He is prepared, by an exposition of the circumstances which have led to the present war, to show that Great Britain has throughout acted towards the United States of America with a spirit of amity, forbearance, and conciliation; and to demonstrate the inadmissible nature of those pretensions which have at length unhappily involved the two countries in war.

"It is well known to the world, that it has been the invariable object of the ruler of France to destroy the power and independence of the British empire, as the chief obstacle to the accomplishment of his ambitious designs.

"He first contemplated the possibility of assembling such a naval force in the channel as, combined with a numerous flotilla, should enable him to disembark in England an army sufficient, in his conception, to subjugate this country; and through the conquest of Great Britain he hoped to realize his project of universal empire.

"By the adoption of an enlarged and provident system of internal defence, and by the valour of his majesty's fleets and armies, this design was entirely frustrated; and the naval force of France, after the most signal defeats, was compelled to retire from the ocean.

"An attempt was then made to effectuate the same purpose by other means—a system was brought forward, by which the ruler of France hoped to annihilate the commerce of Great Britain, to shake her public credit, and to destroy her revenue; to render useless her maritime superiority, and so to avail himself of his continental ascendancy, as to constitute himself, in a great measure, the arbiter of the ocean, notwithstanding the destruction of his fleets.

"With this view, by the decree of Berlin, followed by that of Milan, he declared the British territories to be in a state of blockade; and that all commerce or even correspondence with Great Britain was prohibited. He decreed that every vessel and cargo, which had entered, or was found proceeding to a British port, or which, under any circumstances, had been visited by a British ship of war, should be lawful prize: he declared all British goods and produce, wherever found, and however acquired, whether coming from the mother country or from her colonies, subject to confiscation: he further declared to be denationalized, the flag of all neutral ships that should be found offending against these his decrees; and he gave to this project of universal tyranny, the name of the continental system.

"For these attempts to ruin the commerce of Great Britain, by means subversive of the clearest rights of neutral nations, France endeavoured in vain to rest her justification upon the previous conduct of his majesty's government.

"Under circumstances of unparalleled provocation, his majesty had abstained from any measure which the ordinary rules of the law of nations did not fully warrant. Never was the maritime superiority of a belligerent over his enemy more complete and decided. Never was the opposite belligerent so formidably dangerous in his power, and in his policy to the liberties of all other nations. France had already trampled so openly and systematically on the most sacred rights of neutral powers, as might well have justified the placing her out of the pale of civilized nations. Yet in this extreme case, Great Britain had so used her naval ascendancy, that her enemy could find no just cause of complaint: and, in order to give to these lawless decrees the appearance of retaliation, the ruler of France was obliged to advance principles of maritime law unsanctioned by any other authority than his own arbitrary will.

"The pretexts for these decrees were, first, that Great Britain had exercised the rights of war against private persons, their ships and goods; as if the only object of legitimate hostility on the ocean were the public property of a state, or as if the edicts and the courts of France itself had not at all times enforced this right with peculiar rigour; secondly, that the British orders of blockade, instead of being confined to fortified towns, had, as France asserted, been unlawfully extended to commercial towns and ports, and to the mouths of rivers; and, thirdly, that they had been applied to places, and to coasts, which neither were, nor could be, actually blockaded. The last of these charges is not founded on fact; whilst the others, even by the admission of the American government, are utterly groundless in point of law.

"Against these decrees, his majesty protested and appealed—he called upon the United States to assert their own rights, and to vindicate their independence, thus menaced and attacked; and as France had declared, that she would confiscate every vessel which should touch in Great Britain, or be visited by British ships of war, his majesty, having previously issued the order of January, 1807, as an act of mitigated retaliation, was at length compelled, by the persevering violence of the enemy, and the continued acquiescence of neutral powers, to revisit upon France, in a more effectual manner, the measure of her own injustice, by declaring, in an order in council, bearing date the 11th of November, 1807, that no neutral vessel should proceed to France or to any of the countries from which, in obedience to the dictates of France, British commerce was excluded, without first touching at a port in Great Britain, or her dependencies. At the same time, his majesty intimated his readiness to repeal the orders in council, whenever France should rescind her decrees, and return to the accustomed principles of maritime warfare; and at a subsequent period, as a proof of his majesty's sincere desire to accommodate, as far as possible, his defensive measures to the convenience of neutral powers, the operation of the orders in council was, by an order issued in April, 1809, limited to a blockade of France, and of the countries subjected to her immediate dominion.

"Systems of violence, oppression, and tyranny, can never be suppressed, or even checked, if the power against which such injustice is exercised be debarred from the right of full and adequate retaliation: or, if the measures of the retaliating power are to be considered as matters of just offence to neutral nations, whilst the measure of original aggression and violence are to be tolerated with indifference, submission, or complacency.

"The government of the United States did not fail to remonstrate against the orders in council of Great Britain. Although they knew that these orders would be revoked, if the decree of France, which had occasioned them, were repealed; they resolved at the same moment to resist the conduct of both belligerents, instead of requiring France, in the first instance, to rescind her decrees. Applying most unjustly the same measure of resentment to the aggressor and to the party aggrieved, they adopted measures of commercial resistance against both—a system of resistance which, however varied in the successive acts of embargo, non-intercourse, or non-importation, was evidently unequal in its operation, and principally levelled against the superior commerce, and maritime power of Great Britain.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. VII.

1813.

"The same partiality towards France was observable in their negotiations, as in their measures of alleged resistance.

"Application was made to both belligerents for a revocation of their respective edicts; but the terms in which they were made were widely different.

"Of France was required a revocation only of the Berlin and Milan decrees, although many other edicts, grossly violating the neutral commerce of the United States, had been promulgated by that power. No security was demanded, that the Berlin and Milan decrees, even if revoked, should not under some other form be re-established: and a direct engagement was offered, that upon such revocation the American government would take part in the war against Great Britain, if Great Britain did not immediately rescind her orders. Whereas no corresponding engagement was offered to Great Britain, of whom it was required, not only that the orders in council should be repealed, but that no others of a similar nature should be issued, and that the blockade of May, 1806, should be also abandoned. This blockade, established and enforced according to accustomed practice, had not been objected to by the United States at the time it was issued. Its provisions were on the contrary represented by the American minister, resident in London at the time, to have been so framed, as to afford, in his judgment, a proof of the friendly disposition of the British cabinet towards the United States.

"Great Britain was thus called upon to abandon one of her most important maritime rights; by acknowledging the order of blockade in question, to be one of the edicts which violated the commerce of the United States, although it had never been so considered in the previous negotiations—and although the president of the United States had recently consented to abrogate the non-intercourse act, on the sole condition of the orders in council being revoked; thereby distinctly admitting these orders to be the only edicts which fell within the contemplation of the law under which he acted.

"A proposition so hostile to Great Britain, could not but be proportionably encouraging to the pretensions of the enemy. As by their alleging that the blockade of May, 1806, was illegal, the American government virtually justified, so far as depended on them, the French decrees.

"After this proposition had been made, the French minister for foreign affairs, if not in concert with that government, at least in conformity with its views, in a dispatch, dated the 5th of August, 1810, and addressed to the American minister resident at Paris, stated that the Berlin and Milan decrees were revoked, and that their operation would cease from the 1st day of November following, provided his majesty would revoke his orders in council, and renounce the new principles of blockade; or that the United States would cause their rights to be respected; meaning thereby, that they would resist the retaliatory measures of Great Britain.

"Although the repeal of the French decrees thus announced was evidently contingent, either on concessions to be made by Great Britain, (concessions to which it was obvious Great Britain could not submit,) or on measures to be adopted by the United States of America; the American president at once considered the repeal as absolute. Under that pretence the non-importation act was strictly enforced against Great Britain, whilst the ships of war, and merchant-ships of the enemy, were received into the harbours of America.

"The American government, assuming the repeal of the French decrees to be absolute and effectual, most unjustly required Great Britain, in conformity to her declarations, to revoke her orders in council. The British government denied that the repeal, which was announced in the letter of the French minister for foreign affairs, was such as ought to satisfy Great Britain; and, in order to ascertain the true character of the measure adopted by France, the government of the United States was called upon to produce the instrument, by which the alleged appeal of the French decrees had been effected. If these decrees were really revoked, such an instrument must exist, and no satisfactory reason could be given for withholding it.

"At length, on the 21st of May, 1812, and not before, the American minister in London did produce a copy, or at least what purported to be a copy, of such an instrument.

"It professed to bear date the 28th of April, 1811, long subsequent to the dispatch of the French minister of Foreign affairs of the 5th of August, 1810, or even the day named therein, viz. the 1st of November following, when the operation of the French decrees was to cease. This instrument expressly declared that these French decrees were repealed in consequence of the American legislature having, by their act of the 1st of March, 1811, provided that British ships and merchandize should be excluded from the ports and harbours of the United States.

"By this instrument, the only document produced by America as a repeal of the French decrees, it appears, beyond a possibility of doubt or cavil, that the alleged repeal of the French decrees was conditional, as Great Britain had asserted, and not absolute or final, as had been maintained by America: that they were not repealed at the time they were stated to be repealed by the American government: that they were not repealed in conformity with a proposition simultaneously made to both belligerents; but that in consequence of a previous act on the part of the American government, they were repealed in favor of one belligerent, to the prejudice of the other: that the American government having adopted measures restrictive upon the commerce of both belligerents, in consequence of edicts issued by both, rescinded these measures, as they affected that power which was the aggressor, whilst they put them in full operation against the party aggrieved, although the edicts of both powers continued in force; and, lastly, that they excluded the ships of war belonging to one belligerent, whilst they admitted into their ports and harbours the ships of war belonging to the other, in violation of one of the plainest and most essential duties of a neutral nation.

"Although the instrument thus produced was by no means that general and unqualified revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees which Great Britain had continually demanded, and had a full right to claim; and although this instrument, under all the circumstances of its appearance at that moment, for the first time, was open to the strongest suspicions of its authenticity; yet, as the minister of the United States produced it, as purporting to be a copy of the instrument of revocation, the government of Great Britain, desirous of reverting, if possible, to the ancient and accustomed principles of maritime war, determined upon revoking, conditionally, the orders in council. Accordingly, in the month of June last, his royal highness the prince-regent was pleased to declare in council, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, that the orders in council should be revoked, as far as respected the ships and property of the United States, from the 1st of August following. This revocation was to continue in force, provided the government of the United States should, within a time to be limited, repeal their restrictive laws against British commerce. His majesty's minister in America was expressly ordered to declare to the government of the United States, that 'this measure had been adopted by the prince-regent in the earnest wish and hope, either that the government of France, by further relaxations of its system, might render perseverance on the part of Great Britain, in retaliatory measures, unnecessary; or, if this hope should prove delusive, that his majesty's government might be enabled, in the absence of all irritating and restrictive regulations on either side, to enter, with the government of the United States, into amicable explanations, for the purpose of ascertaining whether, if the necessity of retaliatory measures should unfortunately continue to operate, the particular measures to be acted upon by Great Britain could be rendered more acceptable to the American government, than those hitherto pursued.'

"In order to provide for the contingency of a declaration of war on the part of the United States, previous to the arrival in America of the said order of revocation, instructions were sent to his majesty's minister plenipotentiary, accredited to the United States (the execution of which instructions, in consequence of the discontinuance of Mr. Foster's functions, were, at a subsequent period, entrusted to Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren), directing him to propose a cessation of hostilities, should they have commenced; and, further, to offer a simultaneous repeal of the orders in council, on the one side, and of the restrictive laws on British ships and commerce, on the other.

"They were also respectively empowered to acquaint the American government, in reply to any inquiries with respect to the blockade of May, 1806, whilst the British government must continue to maintain its legality, 'that, in point of fact, this particular blockade had been discontinued for a length of time, having been merged in the general retaliatory blockade of the enemy's ports, under the orders in council; and that his majesty's government had no intention of recurring to this, or to any other of the blockades of the enemy's ports, founded upon the ordinary and accustomed principles of maritime law, which were in force previous to the orders in council, without a new notice to neutral powers, in the usual form.'

"The American government, before they received intimation of the course adopted by the British government, had, in fact, proceeded to the extreme measure of declaring war, and issuing 'letters of marque,' notwithstanding they were previously in possession of the report of the French minister for foreign affairs, of the 12th of March, 1812, promulgating anew the Berlin and Milan decrees as fundamental laws of the French empire, under the false and extravagant pretext, that the monstrous principles therein contained were to be found in the treaty of Utrecht, and were therefore binding upon all states. From the penalties of this code no nation was to be exempt which did not accept it, not only as the rule of its own conduct, but as a law, the observance of which it was also required to enforce upon Great Britain.

"In a manifesto, accompanying their declaration of hostilities, in addition to the former complaints against the orders in council, a long list of grievances was brought forward; some trivial in themselves, others which had been mutually adjusted, but none of them such as were ever before alleged by the American government to be grounds for war.

"As if to throw additional obstacles in the way of peace, the American congress at the same time passed a law prohibiting all intercourse with Great Britain, of such a tenor as deprived the executive government, according to the president's own construction of that act, of all power of restoring the relations of friendly intercourse between the two states, so far, at least, as concerned their commercial intercourse, until congress should reassemble.

"The President of the United States has, it is true, since proposed to Great Britain an armistice; not, however, on the admission that the cause of war, hitherto relied on, was removed, but on condition that Great Britain, as a preliminary step, should do away a cause of war, now brought forward as such, for the first time, namely, that she should abandon the exercise of her undoubted right of search, to take from American merchant-vessels British seamen, the natural-born subjects of his majesty; and this concession was required upon a mere assurance, that laws would be enacted by the legislature of the United States, to prevent such seamen from entering into their service; but, independent of the objection to an exclusive reliance on a foreign state, for the conservation of so vital an interest, no explanation was, or could be afforded by the agent, who was charged with this overture, either as to the main principles upon which such laws were to be founded, or as to the provisions which it was proposed they should contain.

"This proposition having been objected to, a second proposal was made, again offering an armistice, provided the British government would secretly stipulate to renounce the exercise of this right in a treaty of peace. An immediate and formal abandonment of its exercise, as preliminary to a cessation of hostilities, was not demanded; but his royal highness the prince-regent was required, in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, secretly to abandon what the former overture had proposed to him publicly to concede.

"This most offensive proposition was also rejected, being accompanied, as the former had been, by other demands of the most exceptionable nature, and especially of indemnity for all American vessels detained and condemned under the orders in council, or under what were termed illegal blockades—a compliance with which demands, exclusive of all other objections, would have amounted to an absolute surrender of the rights on which those orders and blockades were founded.

"Had the American government been sincere in representing the orders in council as the only subject of difference between Great Britain and the United States, calculated to lead to hostilities, it might have been expected, so soon as the revocation of those orders had been officially made known to them, that they would have spontaneously recalled their 'letters of marque,' and manifested a disposition immediately to restore the relations of peace and amity between the two powers.

"But the conduct of the government of the United States by no means corresponded with such reasonable expectations.

"The orders in council of the 23d of June being officially communicated in America, the government of the United States saw nothing in the repeal of the orders in council, which should of itself restore peace, unless Great Britain were prepared, in the first instance, substantially to relinquish the right of impressing her own seamen, when found on-board American merchant-ships.

"The proposal of an armistice, and of a simultaneous repeal of the restrictive measures on both sides, subsequently made by the commanding officer of his majesty's naval forces on the American coast, were received in the same hostile spirit by the government of the United States. The suspension of the practice of impressment was insisted upon, in the correspondence which passed on that occasion, as a necessary preliminary to a cessation of hostilities: negotiation, it was stated, might take place without any suspension of the exercise of this right, and also without any armistice being concluded; but Great Britain was required previously to agree, without any knowledge of the adequacy of the system which could be substituted, to negotiate upon the basis of accepting the legislative regulations of a foreign state as the sole equivalent for the exercise of a right which she has felt to be essential to the support of her maritime power.

"If America, by demanding this preliminary concession, intends to deny the validity of that right, in that denial Great Britain cannot acquiesce; nor will she give countenance to such a pretension, by acceding to its suspension, much less to its abandonment, as a basis on which to treat. If the American government has devised, or conceives it can devise, regulations which may safely be accepted by Great Britain, as a substitute for the exercise of the right in question, it is for them to bring forward such a plan for consideration. The British government has never attempted to exclude this question from amongst those on which the two states might have to negotiate: it has, on the contrary, uniformly professed its readiness to receive and discuss any proposition on this subject, coming from the American government: it has never asserted any exclusive right, as to the impressment of British seamen from American vessels, which it was not prepared to acknowledge, as appertaining equally to the government of the United States, with respect to American seamen when found on-board British merchant-ships. But it cannot, by acceding to such a basis in the first instance, either assume, or admit that to be practicable, which, when attempted on former occasions, has always been found to be attended with great difficulties; such difficulties as the British commissioners, in 1806, expressly declared, after an attentive consideration of the suggestions brought forward by the commissioners on the part of America, they were unable to surmount.

"Whilst this proposition, transmitted through the British admiral, was pending in America, another communication, on the subject of an armistice, was unofficially made to the British government in this country. The agent from whom this proposition was received, acknowledged that he did not consider that he had any authority himself to sign an agreement on the part of his government. It was obvious that any stipulations entered into, in consequence of this overture, would have been binding on the British government, whilst the government of the United States would have been free to refuse or accept them, according to the circumstances of the moment. This proposition was therefore necessarily declined.

"After this exposition of the circumstances which preceded, and which have followed the declaration of war by the United States, his royal highness the prince-regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, feels himself called upon to declare the leading principles by which the conduct of Great Britain has been regulated in the transactions connected with these discussions.

"His royal highness can never acknowledge any blockade whatsoever to be illegal, which has been duly notified, and is supported by an adequate force, merely upon the ground of its extent, or because the port or ports blockaded are not at the same time invested by land.

"His royal highness can never admit, that neutral trade with Great Britain can be constituted a public crime, the commission of which can expose the ships of any power whatever to be denationalized.

"His royal highness can never admit, that Great Britain can be debarred of its right and just and necessary retaliation, through the fear of eventually affecting the interest of a neutral.

"His royal highness can never admit, that in the exercise of the undoubted, and hitherto undisputed, right of searching neutral merchant-vessels in time of war, the impressment of British seamen, when found therein, can be deemed any violation of a neutral flag. Neither can he admit, that the taking such seamen from on-board such vessels can be considered by any neutral state as a hostile measure, or a justifiable cause of war.

"There is no right more clearly established, than the right which a sovereign has to the allegiance of his subjects, more especially in time of war. Their allegiance is no optional duty, which they can decline and resume at pleasure. It is a call which they are bound to obey; it began with their birth, and can only terminate with their existence.

"If a similarity of language and manners may make the exercise of this right more liable to partial mistakes, and occasional abuse, when practised towards vessels of the United States, the same circumstances make it also a right with the exercise of which, in regard to such vessels, it is more difficult to dispense.

"But if to the practice of the United States to harbour British seamen be added their assumed right to transfer the allegiance of British subjects, and thus to cancel the jurisdiction of their legitimate sovereign, by acts of naturalization and certificates of citizenship, which they pretend to be as valid out of their own territory as within it, it is obvious, that to abandon this ancient right of Great Britain, and to admit these novel pretensions of the United States, would be to expose to danger the very foundation of our maritime strength.

"Without entering minutely into the other topics which have been brought forward by the government of the United States, it may be proper to remark, that whatever the declaration of the United States may have asserted, Great Britain never did demand that they should force British manufactures into France; and she formally declared her willingness entirely to forego, or modify, in concert with the United States, the system by which a commercial intercourse with the enemy had been allowed under the protection of licenses; provided the United States would act towards her, and towards France, with real impartiality.

"The government of America, if the difference between states are not interminable, has as little right to notice the affair of the Chesapeake. The aggression, in this instance, on the part of a British officer, was acknowledged, his conduct was disapproved, and a reparation was regularly tendered by Mr. Foster on the part of his majesty, and accepted by the government of the United States.

"It is not less unwarranted in the allusion to the mission of Mr. Henry; a mission undertaken without the authority, or even knowledge, of his majesty's government, and which Mr. Foster was authorized formally and officially to disavow.

"The charge of exciting the Indians to offensive measures against the United States is equally void of foundation. Before the war began, a policy the most opposite had been uniformly pursued, and proof of this was tendered by Mr. Foster to the American government.

"Such are the causes of war which have been put forward by the government of the United States. But the real origin of the present contest will be found in that spirit which has long unhappily actuated the councils of the United States: their marked partiality in palliating and assisting the aggressive tyranny of France; their systematic endeavours to enflame the people against the defensive measures of Great Britain; their ungenerous conduct towards Spain, the intimate ally of Great Britain; and their unworthy desertion of the cause of other neutral nations. It is through the prevalence of such councils that America has been associated in policy with France, and committed in war against Great Britain.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. VII.

1813.

"And under what conduct, on the part of France, has the government of the United States thus lent itself to the enemy? The contemptuous violation of the commercial treaty of the year 1800 between France and the United States; the treacherous seizure of all American vessels and cargoes in every harbour subject to the controul of the French arms: the tyrannical principles of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and the confiscations under them; the subsequent condemnations under the Rambouillet decree, antedated or concealed to render it the more effectual; the French commercial regulations which render the traffic of the United States with France almost illusory; the burning of their merchant-ships at sea, long after the alleged repeal of the French decrees—all these acts of violence, on the part of France, produce from the government of the United States, only such complaints as end in acquiescence and submission, or are accompanied by suggestions for enabling France to give the semblance of a legal form to her usurpations, by converting them into municipal regulations.

"This disposition of the government of the United States—this complete subserviency to the ruler of France—this hostile temper towards Great Britain—are evident in almost every page of the official correspondence of the American with the French government.

"Against this course of conduct, the real cause of the present war, the prince-regent solemnly protests. Whilst contending against France, in defence not only of the liberties of Great Britain but of the world, his royal highness was entitled to look for a far different result. From their common origin, from their common interest, from their professed principles of freedom and independence, the United States were the last power in which Great Britain could have expected to find a willing instrument and abettor of French tyranny.

"Disappointed in this, his just expectation, the prince-regent will still pursue the policy which the British government has so long and invariably maintained, in repelling injustice, and in supporting the general rights of nations; and, under the favor of Providence, relying on the justice of his cause, and the tried loyalty and firmness of the British nation, his royal highness confidently looks forward to a successful issue to the contest in which he has thus been compelled most reluctantly to engage.

"Westminster, Jan. 9, 1813."

James Madison having been chosen president, and Eddridge Gerry, vice-president of the United States for the ensuing four years, from the 4th of March, 1813; the former having attended, at twelve o'clock on the above day, the capitol, for the purpose of taking the oath of office, delivered to the vast concourse of people assembled on the occasion, the following speech:

"About to add the solemnity of an oath to the obligations imposed by a second call to the station in which my country has here before placed me, I find, in the presence of this respectable assembly, an opportunity of publicly repeating my profound sense of so distinguished a confidence, and of the responsibility united with it. The impressions on me are strengthened by such an evidence, that my faithful endeavours to discharge my duties have been favorably estimated; and by a consideration on the momentous period at which the trust has been renewed. From the weight and magnitude now belonging to it, I should be compelled to sink if I had less reliance on the support of an enlightened and generous people, and feel less deeply a conviction that the war with a powerful nation, which forms so prominent a feature in our situation, is stamped with that justice which invites the smiles of heaven on the means of conducting it to a successful termination.

"May we not cherish this sentiment without presumption, when we reflect on the characters by which this war is distinguished?

"It was not declared on the part of the United States until it had been long made on them in reality, though not in name; until arguments and expostulations had been exhausted; until a positive declaration had been received that the wrongs provoking it would not be discontinued, nor until this appeal could no longer be delayed without breaking down the spirit of the nation, destroying all confidence in itself and in its political institutions; and either perpetuating a state of disgraceful suffering, or regaining, by more costly sacrifices, and more severe struggles, our lost rank and respect among the independent powers.

"On the issue of the war are staked our national sovereignty on the high seas, and security of an important class of citizens, whose occupations give the proper value to those of every other class. Not to contend for such a stake, is to surrender our equality with other powers on the element common to all; and to violate the sacred title which every member of the society has to its protection.

"I need not call into view, the unlawfulness of the practice by which our mariners are forced, at the will of every cruising officer, from their own vessels into foreign ones, nor paint the outrages inseparable from it. The proofs are in the records of each successive administration of our government—and the cruel sufferings of that portion of the American people have found their way to every bosom, not dead to the sympathies of human nature.

"As the war was just in its origin, and necessary and noble in its objects, we can reflect with a proud satisfaction, that in carrying it on no principle of justice or honor, no usage of civilized nations, no precept of courtesy, or humanity, have been infringed. The war has been waged on our part with scrupulous regard to all these obligations, and in a spirit of liberality which was never surpassed.

"How little has been the effect of this example on the conduct of the enemy? They have retained, as prisoners of war, citizens of the United States, not liable to be so considered under the usages of war.

"They have refused to consider as prisoners of war, and threatened to punish as traitors, and deserters, persons emigrating without restraint to the United States; incorporated by naturalization into our political family, and fighting under the authority of their adopted country, in open and honorable war, for the maintenance of its rights and safety. Such are the avowed principles of a government which is in the practice of naturalizing, by thousands, citizens of other countries, and not only of permitting, but compelling them to fight its battles against their native country.

"They have not, it is true, taken into their own hands the hatchet and the knife, devoted to indiscriminate massacre; but they have let loose the savages armed with these cruel instruments; have allured them into their service, and carried them into battle by their sides, eager to glut their savage thirst with the blood of the vanquished, and to finish the work of torture and death on maimed and defenceless captives. And, what was never seen before, British commanders have extorted victory over the unconquerable valour of our troops, by presenting to the sympathy of their chief awaiting massacre from their savage associates.

"And now we find them, in further contempt of the modes of honorable warfare, supplying the place of a conquering force, by attempts to disorganize our political society, to dismember our confederated republic. Happily, like others, those will recoil on the authors; but they mark the degenerate councils from which they emanate, and, if they did not belong to a series of unexampled inconsistencies, might excite the greater wonder, as proceeding from a government which founded the very war in which it has been so long engaged, on a charge against the disorganizing and insurrectional policy of its adversary.

"To render the justice of the war on our part more conspicuous, the reluctance to commence it was followed by the earliest and strongest manifestations of a disposition to arrest its progress. The sword was scarcely out of the scabbard before the enemy was apprised of the reasonable terms on which it would be re-sheathed. Still more precise advances were repeated, and have been received in a spirit forbidding every reliance not placed in the military resources of the nation.

"These resources are amply sufficient to bring the war to an honorable issue. Our nation is, in number, more than half that of the British Isles. It is composed of a brave, a free, a virtuous, and an intelligent people. Our country abounds in the necessities, the arts, and comforts of life. A general prosperity is visible in the public countenance. The means employed by the British cabinet to undermine it, have recoiled on themselves; have given to our national faculties a more rapid development; and, draining or diverting the precious metals from British circulation and British vaults, have poured them into those of the United States. It is a propitious consideration, that an unavoidable war should have found this seasonable facility for the contributions required to support it. When the public voice called for war, all knew, and still know, that without them, it could not be carried on through the period which it might last; and the patriotism, the good sense, and the manly spirit of our fellow-citizens are pledges for the cheerfulness with which they will bear each his share of the common burden. To render the war short, and its success sure, animated and systematic exertions alone are necessary; and the success of our arms now may long preserve our country from the necessity of another resort to them. Already have the gallant exploits of our naval heroes proved to the world our inherent capacity to maintain our rights on one element. If the reputation of our arms has been thrown under clouds on the other, presaging flashes of heroic enterprise assure us, that nothing is wanting to correspondent triumphs there also, but the discipline and habits which are in daily progress."

This speech was well calculated to excite the feelings of the vulgar; but all Mr. Madison's arguments had been already, and indeed incontrovertibly, answered by the memorial of about 1,500 of the inhabitants of the United States, extracts of which have been given in the commencement of the preceding chapter. The president, it seems, had studied the *Bonaparte*an style: "they have let loose the savages armed with the hatchet and the knife;" but he was not aware that he was railing at the then French emperor, who had invited Turks, &c. to join him in his ambitious views. Canada was at this time in the possession of the English: it was originally taken by them in 1628; restored to France, 1631; and again taken September 13, 1759.

CHAPTER VIII.

Remarks.—Capture of the Frolic, by the Americans.—Of the Macedonian.—Retreat of General Dearborn from Champlain.—Repulse of the American General Smyth.—Blockade of the Chesapeake and Delaware by the British.—Capture of the Java by the Constitution.—Defeat and Capture of General Winchester and his Army.—Defeat of the Americans at Ogdenburg.—Capture of York by General Dearborn.—Surrender of Mobile to the Americans.—Loss of the Peacock.—Blockade of New York, Charleston, &c.—Successes of Admiral Cockburn, in the Bay of Chesapeake.—Proceedings in the British Parliament relative to the War with the United States.

THE loss and disgrace which the American arms sustained in Canada were in some degree balanced by their continued success on the element which had long been the theatre of triumph to their adversaries. The strength of the navy of the United States consisted in a few frigates, of the rate corresponding to the largest British; but in size, weight of metal, and number of men, almost equal to ships of the line-of-battle. This difference seems not to have been known, or not attended to, in the British navy, the officers of which, with their habitual readiness to meet an enemy, would certainly never decline an encounter when the nominal force was any thing near a parity. Indeed, the superiority of British skill and valour, in engaging with other enemies, had often compensated the difference of force; but the American navy were manned by sailors, many of whom were unfortunately British, and many more had been trained in British service. The Americans, in manning their navy, not only took care to select able seamen, but almost doubled the usual compliment; while the crews of the British were mostly ordinary seamen.

On the 18th of October his majesty's armed brig Frolic, conveying the homeward-bound trade from the bay of Honduras, while in the act of repairing damages to her masts and sails received in a violent gale on the preceding night, descried a vessel which gave chase to the convoy. She proved to be the United States sloop of war Wasp, which the Frolic gallantly brought to action, though in her crippled state, in order to save her convoy. She soon, however, became so unmanageable, that the Wasp was enabled to take a raking position, whilst the Frolic could not get a gun to bear. The result was, that every individual officer being wounded, and not more than twenty of the crew remaining unhurt, the enemy boarded, and made prize of the brig. Before the day closed, however, his majesty's ship Poictiers coming up, not only recaptured the Frolic, but took the Wasp.

On the 25th of October, a very severe action took place between the Macedonian frigate, Captain Carden, and the United States frigate, Commodore Decatur, which terminated in the capture of the former. The following is Captain Carden's account of this action, dated on-board the United States, at sea, 28th of October, 1812.

"Sir,—It is with the deepest regret I have to acquaint you, for the information of my lords commissioners of the admiralty, that his majesty's late ship Macedonian was captured on the 25th instant by the United States' ship United States, Commodore Decatur commander: the detail is as follows:—

"A short time after daylight, steering N. W. by W. with the wind from the southward, in lat. 29 deg. N. and long. 29 deg. 30 min. W. in the execution of their lordships' orders, a sail was seen on the lee-beam, which I immediately stood for, and made her out to be a large frigate under American colours: at nine o'clock I closed with her, and she commenced the action, which we returned; but from the enemy keeping two points off the wind, I was not enabled to get as close to her as I could have wished. After an hour's action, the enemy backed and came to the wind, and I was then enabled to bring her to close battle; in this situation I soon found the enemy's force too superior to expect success, unless some very fortunate chance occurred in our favour; and with this hope I continued the battle to two hours and ten minutes, when, having the mizen-mast shot away by the board, topmasts shot away by the caps, main-yard shot in pieces, lower masts badly wounded, lower rigging all cut to pieces, a small proportion only of the foresail left to the fore-yard, all the guns on the quarter-deck and fore-castle disabled but two, and filled with wreck, two also on the main-deck disabled, and several shot between wind and water, a very great proportion of the crew killed and wounded, and the enemy comparatively in good order, who had now shot a-head, and was about to place himself in a raking position, without our being enabled to return the fire, being a perfect wreck, and unmanageable log; I deemed it prudent, though a painful extremity, to surrender his majesty's ship; nor was this dreadful alternative resorted to till every hope of success was removed even beyond the reach of chance, nor till, I trust, their lordships will be aware every effort had been made against the enemy by myself, my brave officers and men; nor should she have been surrendered whilst a man lived on-board, had she been manageable. I am sorry to say, our loss is very severe: I find, by this day's muster, thirty-six killed, three of whom lingered a short time after the battle; thirty-six severely wounded, many of whom cannot recover; and thirty-two slightly wounded, who may all do well:—total, one hundred and four.

"The truly noble and animating conduct of my officers, and the steady bravery of my crew, to the last moment of the battle, must ever render them dear to their country.

"My first lieutenant, David Hope, was severely wounded in the head towards the close of the battle, and taken below; but was soon again on deck, displaying that greatness of mind and exertion, which, though it may be equalled, can never be excelled; the third lieutenant, John Bulford, was also wounded, but not obliged to quit his quarters: second lieutenant Samuel Mottley, and he, deserve my highest acknowledgments. The cool and steady conduct of Mr. Walker, the master, was very great during the battle, as also that of Lieutenants Wilson and Magill, of the marines.

"On being taken on-board the enemy's ship, I ceased to wonder at the result of the battle. The United States is built with the scantling of a seventy-four gun-ship, mounting thirty long 24-pounders (English ship-guns) on her main-deck, and twenty-two 42-pounders carronades, with two long 24-pounders on her quarter-deck and fore-castle, howitzer-guns on her tops, and a travelling carronade on her upper-deck, with a complement of 478 picked men.

"The enemy has suffered much in her masts, rigging, and hull above and below water: her loss in killed and wounded I am not aware of, but I know a lieutenant and six men have been thrown overboard.

"Enclosed you will be pleased to receive the names of the killed and wounded on-board the Macedonian; and have the honour to be, &c.

"JOHN S. CARDEN.

"To J. W. Croker, Esq.
Admiralty."

In these several defeats sustained by the British navy, no honor was lost, since every thing was done in defence that could be effected by courage and conduct against superior force. The unusual circumstance, however, of English ships striking to foreign of a similar class, produced as much mortification on one side as triumph on the other.

The American government, notwithstanding its failures by land, persisted in its purpose of invading Canada. On the 10th of November, the Americans sent out seven sail of armed vessels from Sackett's harbour, on Lake Ontario, manned by the crew of one of the American frigates, and commanded by some of their naval officers, having on-board a considerable detachment of troops, for the purpose of carrying the port of Kingston by surprise, and of destroying his majesty's ship Royal George, then lying there. The vigilance and military skill of Colonel Vincent, however, who commanded at Kingston, frustrated their designs; and after many hours of ineffectual cannonade, the American flotilla hauled off, and on the following day returned into port. The British general, Sir George Prevost, having received information of the advance of the enemy under General Dearborn with their whole force of regulars and militia encamped at Plattsburgh, from that place to the village at Champlain, about six miles from the province line, with the avowed purpose of penetrating to Montreal, directed the brigade of troops at Montreal, consisting of two companies of the royals, seven companies of the 8th or king's, four companies of the Montreal volunteer militia, and the fifth battalion of the embodied Canadian militia, with one troop of volunteer cavalry, and a brigade of light artillery, the whole under the command of Colonel Baynes, to cross the St. Lawrence and advance to the support of Major-general De Rottenburgh, whose front was threatened by this movement of the enemy: the troops crossed with uncommon expedition on the evening of the 19th, and reached La Prairie that night.

Immediately upon the alarm being given that the enemy were advancing, the sedentary militia flocked in from all quarters, with a zeal and alacrity which cannot be too much praised. The enemy, after their advance to Champlain, made several reconnoissances beyond the lines into the province; one in particular, on the night of the 19th, with a detachment of cavalry, and a body of about 1,000 of their regular infantry, the whole under the command of Lieut-col. Pike, who was esteemed, in the United States, an able officer; but falling in unexpectedly with a small part of voyageurs and Indians, one of the British advanced-pickets, by whom they were fired upon, they were thrown into the greatest confusion, and commenced a fire upon each other, which was attended with a loss of about fifty of their men in killed and wounded, when they dispersed. The picket made good their retreat unmolested, and without a man being hurt.

BOOK XI.

Cm. VIII.

1812.

Nothing more occurred in this quarter during the remainder of the year. General Dearborn, seeing the vigorous preparations of Sir George Prevost to receive him, was afraid to advance any further; and, on the 22d of November, he commenced a retreat with his whole army, which he conducted upon Plattsburg, Burlington, and Albany, where he took up his winter-quarters.

On the 28th of November a partial action took place, in which the main body of the Americans, under Brigadier-general Smyth, was repulsed with loss, in an attempt to force the Niagara frontier, between Chippawa and fort Erie, by a small division of British, under Lieutenant-colonel Bishopp.

On the 26th of December a public notice was issued by the prince-regent, that the ports and harbours of the Chesapeake and Delaware were placed in a state of blockade.

Before the year closed, the Americans obtained another triumph over the British navy, in the capture of his majesty's frigate Java, Captain Lambert, on the 29th of December. The Java was bound to the East Indies, and off the coast of Brazil met with the American frigate Constitution, where a very severe action ensued, in the course of which Captain Lambert having received a mortal wound, and the ship being rendered quite unmanageable, from the damages she had sustained in her masts and rigging, Mr. Chads, the first lieutenant, who succeeded to the command, was under the disagreeable necessity of striking his colours. This unfortunate event was communicated to the admiralty, by Mr. Chads, in the following manner:—

United States Frigate Constitution, off St. Salvador, Dec. 31, 1812.

"Sir,—It is with deep regret that I write you, for the information of the lords commissioners of the admiralty, that his majesty's ship Java is no more, after sustaining an action, on the 29th instant, for several hours, with the American frigate Constitution, which resulted in the capture and ultimate destruction of his majesty's ship. Captain Lambert being dangerously wounded in the height of the action, the melancholy task of writing the detail devolves on me.

"On the morning of the 29th instant, at eight, a. m. off St. Salvador, (coast of Brazil,) the wind at north-east, we perceived a strange sail; made all sail in chase, and soon made her out to be a large frigate; at noon prepared for action, the chase not answering our private signals, and tacking towards us under easy sail; when about four miles distant she made a signal, and immediately tacked and made all sail away upon the wind. We soon found we had the advantage of her in sailing, and came up with her fast, when she hoisted American colours; she then bore about three points on our lee-bow. At fifty minutes past one, p. m. the enemy shortened sail, upon which we bore down upon her; at ten minutes past two, when about half a mile distant, she opened her fire, giving us a larboard-broadside, which was not returned till we were close on her weather-bow. Both ships now manœuvred to obtain advantageous positions, our opponent evidently avoiding close action, and firing high to disable our masts, in which he succeeded too well, having shot away the head of our bowsprit with the jib-boom, and our running rigging so much cut as to prevent our preserving the weather-gage.

"At five minutes past three, finding the enemy's raking-fire extremely heavy, Captain Lambert ordered the ship to be laid on-board, in which we should have succeeded, had not our fore-mast been shot away at this moment, the remains of our bowsprit passing over his taffrail; shortly after this the main-top-mast went, leaving the ship totally unmanageable, with most of our starboard guns rendered useless from the wreck lying over them.

"At half-past three our gallant captain received a dangerous wound in the breast, and was carried below; from this time we could not fire more than two or three guns until a quarter past four, when our mizen-mast was shot away; the ship then fell off a little, and brought many of our starboard guns to bear; the enemy's rigging was so much cut that he could not now avoid shooting a-head, which brought us fairly broadside and broadside. Our main-yard now went into the slings, both ships continued engaged in this manner till thirty-five minutes past four, we frequently on fire in consequence of the wreck lying on the side engaged. Our opponent now made sail a-head out of gun-shot, where he remained an hour repairing his damages, leaving us an unmanageable wreck, with only the main-mast left, and that tottering. Every exertion was made by us during this interval to place the ship in a state to renew the action. We succeeded in clearing the wreck of our masts from our guns, a sail was set on the stumps of the fore-mast and bowsprit, the weather half of the main-yard remaining aloft, the main-tack was got forward in the hope of getting the ship before the wind, our helm being still perfect: the effort unfortunately proved ineffectual, from the main-mast falling over the side, from the heavy rolling of the ship, which nearly covered the whole of our star-board guns. We still waited the attack of the enemy, he now standing towards us for that purpose; on his coming nearly within hail of us, and from his manœuvre perceiving he intended a position a-head, where he could rake us without a possibility of our returning a shot. I then consulted the officers, who agreed with myself, that our having a great part of our crew killed and wounded, our bowsprit and three masts gone, several guns useless, we should not be justified in wasting the lives of more of those remaining, who, I hope their lordships and the country will think have bravely defended his majesty's ship. Under these circumstances, however reluctantly, at fifty minutes past five, our colours were lowered from the stump of the mizen-mast, and we were taken possession of, a little after six, by the American frigate Constitution, commanded by Commodore Bainbridge, who, immediately after ascertaining the state of the ship, resolved on burning her, which we had the satisfaction of seeing done as soon as the wounded were removed. Annexed I send you a return of the killed and wounded, and it is with pain I perceive it so numerous; also a statement of the comparative force of the two ships, when I hope their lordships will not think the British flag tarnished, although success has not attended us. It would be presumptuous in me to speak of Captain Lambert's merits, who, though still in danger from his wound, we entertain the greatest hopes of his being restored to the service and his country.

"It is most gratifying to my feelings to notice the gallantry of every officer, seaman, and marine, on-board: in justice to the officers, I beg leave to mention them individually. I can never speak too highly of the able exertions of Lieutenants Hevingham and Buchanan, and also of Mr. Robinson, master, who was severely wounded, and Lieutenants Mercer and Davis, of the royal marines, the latter of whom also was severely wounded. To Captain John Marshal, R. N. who was a passenger, I am particularly obliged for his exertions and advice throughout the action. To Lieutenant Aplin, who was on the main-deck, and Lieutenant Saunders, who commanded on the fore-castle, I also return my thanks. I cannot but notice the good conduct of the mates and midshipmen, many of whom are killed, and the greater part wounded. To Mr. T. C. Jones, surgeon, and his assistants, every praise is due, for their unwearied assiduity in the care of the wounded. Lieutenant-general Hislop, Major Walker, and Captain Wood, of his staff, the latter of whom was severely wounded, were solicitous to assist and remain on the quarter-deck. I cannot conclude this letter, without expressing my grateful acknowledgments, thus publicly, for the generous treatment Captain Lambert and his officers have experienced from our gallant enemy, Commodore Bainbridge and his officers.

"I have the honor to be, &c.

"H. D. CHADS, first lieutenant of his majesty's late ship Java.

"P. S. The Constitution has also suffered severely both in her rigging and men, having her fore and mizen-masts, main top-mast, both maintop sail-yards, spanker-boom, gaff, and trysail-mast badly shot, and the greatest part of the standing rigging very much damaged, with ten men killed, the commodore, fifth lieutenant, and forty-six men wounded, four of whom are since dead."

Force of the two Ships.

JAVA.

28 long 18-pounders.

16 carronades, 32-pounders.

2 long 9-pounders.

—
46 guns.

Weight of metal, 1034lbs.

Ship's company and supernumeraries, 377.

CONSTITUTION.

32 long 24-pounders.

22 carronades, 32-pounders.

1 carronade, 18-pounder.

—
55 guns.

Weight of metal, 1490.

Crew, 480.

The gallant Captain Lambert died, in consequence of his wounds, a few days after the action, and was interred, with all military honors, in Fort St. Pedro.

The following extract of a letter from New York will shew in what manner these successes operated upon the minds of the Americans.

"The unexpected success of the navy has much roused the spirit of the nation, and produced a disposition in all parties to foster and increase it. The fashionable doctrine now is, that an American ship of war is more than a match for a British one of equal force. The idea of protecting British seamen against the allegiance they owe to their country, is getting exploded by all parties; and the only difficulty is to hit upon an expedient that will be satisfactory to the British government, in securing to them the services of those people, in place of the very obnoxious mode of impressment."

The success of the Americans, by sea, seems to have inspired them with so much confidence, that they determined to try the issue of another attack on Canada. Accordingly, Brigadier-general Winchester, with a division of the American forces, consisting of more than 1,000 men, being the right-wing of Major-general Harrison's army, advanced, in January, 1813, to the attack of Detroit, and obtained possession of Frenchtown, twenty-six miles from that place. But on the 22d, however, he was completely defeated by Colonel Proctor, who commanded in the Michigan territory, with a force which he had hastily collected upon the approach of the enemy, consisting of a small detachment of the 10th royal veteran battalion, three companies of the 41st regiment, a party of the royal Newfoundland fencibles, the sailors belonging to the Queen Charlotte, and 150 of the Essex militia, and about 600 Indians; the result of the action was the surrender of Brigadier-general Winchester, with 500 officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the American army, and with a loss on their part of nearly the like number in killed and wounded. For the details of this affair, which reflects the highest credit upon Colonel Proctor, for the promptitude, gallantry, and decision which he manifested upon this occasion, we must refer to the following letter, which he transmitted to Major-general Sheaffe, dated Sandwich, January 25:

BOOK XI.

CH. VIII.

1813.

"Sir,—In my last dispatch I acquainted you that the enemy was in the Michigan territory, marching upon Detroit, and that I therefore deemed it necessary that he should be attacked without delay, with all and every description of force within my reach. Early in the morning of the 19th, I was informed of his being in possession of Frenchtown, on the river Raisin, 26 miles from Detroit, after experiencing every resistance that Major Reynolds, of the Essex militia, had it in his power to make, with a three-pounder well served and directed by Bombardier Kitson, of the royal artillery, and the militia, three of whom he had well trained to the use of it. The retreat of the gun was covered by a brave band of Indians, who made the enemy pay dear for what he obtained. This party, composed of militia and Indians, with the gun, fell back eighteen miles to Brown's town, the settlement of the brave Wyandots, where I directed my force to assemble. On the 21st instant, I advanced twelve miles to Swan-creek, from whence we marched to the enemy, and attacked him at break of day on the 22d instant; and after suffering, for our numbers, a considerable loss, the enemy's force posted in houses and enclosures, and which, from dread of falling into the hands of the Indians, they most obstinately defended, at length surrendered at discretion; the other part of their force, in attempting to retreat by the way they came, were, I believe, all, or with very few exceptions, killed by the Indians. Brigadier-general Winchester was taken in the pursuit by the Wyandot chief, Roundhead, who afterwards surrendered him to me. You will perceive that I have lost no time; indeed, it was necessary to be prompt in my movements, as the enemy would have been joined by Major-general Harrison in a few days. The troops, the marine, and the militia, displayed great bravery, and behaved uncommonly well. Where so much zeal and spirit were manifested, it would be unjust to attempt to particularize any; I cannot, however, refrain from mentioning Lieutenant-colonel St. George, who received four wounds in a gallant attempt to occupy a building which was favorably situated for annoying the enemy; together with Ensign Kerr, of the Newfoundland regiment, who, I fear, is very dangerously wounded. The zeal and courage of the Indian department were never more conspicuous than on this occasion, and the Indian warriors fought with their usual bravery. I am much indebted to the different departments, the troops having been well and timely supplied with every requisite the district could afford. I have fortunately not been deprived of the services of Lieutenant Troughton, of the royal artillery, and acting in the quarter-master-general's department, although he was wounded, to whose zealous and unwearied exertions I am greatly indebted, as well as to the whole of the royal artillery, for their conduct in this affair. I enclose a list of the killed and wounded, and cannot but lament that there are so many of both; but of the latter I am happy to say a large proportion will return to their duty, and most of them in a short time. I also enclose a return of the arms and ammunition which have been taken, as well as of the prisoners, whom you will perceive to be equal to my utmost force, exclusive of the Indians. It is reported that a party, consisting of 100 men, bringing 500 hogs for General Winchester's force, has been completely cut off by the Indians, and the convoy taken. Lieutenant McLean, my acting brigade-major, whose gallantry and exertions were conspicuous on the 22d instant, is the bearer of this dispatch, and will be able to afford you every information respecting our situation.

"I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) "HENRY PROCTOR."

The loss of the British, in this action, was twenty-four killed, and 158 wounded.

The Americans posted at Ogdenburg, near the river St. Lawrence, having availed themselves of the frozen state of that river to make frequent predatory incursions upon the inhabitants on the Canadian border, Sir George Prevost, arriving, on the 21st of February, at Prescott, opposite the enemy, directed an attack of his position at Ogdenburgh, which took place on the following day, under the command of Major Macdonald, of the

Glengarry light-infantry fencibles, at the head of about 480 regulars and militia. The following is Major Macdonald's account of this affair:—

"I this morning, about seven o'clock, crossed the river St. Lawrence, upon the ice, and attacked and carried, after a little more than an hour's action, his position in and near the opposite town of Ogdensburgh, taking eleven pieces of cannon, and all his ordnance, marine, commissariat, and quartermaster-general's stores, four officers and seventy prisoners, and burning two armed schooners and two large gun-boats, and both his barracks. My force consisted of about 480 regulars and militia, and was divided into two columns: the right, commanded by Captain Jenkins, of the Glengarry light-infantry fencibles, was composed of his own flank-company, and about seventy militia; and from the state of the ice, and the enemy's position in the old French fort, was directed to check his left, and interrupt his retreat, whilst I moved on with the left column, consisting of 120 of the king's regiment, forty of the royal Newfoundland corps, and about 200 militia, towards his position in the town, where he had posted his heavy field-artillery. The depth of the snow in some degree retarded the advance of both columns, and exposed them, particularly the right, to a heavy cross-fire from the batteries of the enemy, for a longer period than I had expected; but pushing on rapidly after the batteries began to open upon us, the left column soon gained the right bank of the river, under the direct fire of his artillery and line of musketry, posted on an eminence near the shore;—moving on rapidly my advance, consisting of the detachment of the royal Newfoundland and some select militia, I turned his right with the detachment of the king's regiment, and after a few discharges from his artillery, took them with the bayonet, and drove his infantry through the town, some escaping across the Black river into the fort, but the majority fled to the woods, or sought refuge in the houses, from whence they kept such a galling fire, that it was necessary to dislodge them with our field-pieces, which now came up from the bank of the river, where they had stuck on landing, in the deep snow.

"Having gained the high ground on the brink of the Black river, opposite the fort, I prepared to carry it by storm; but the men, being quite exhausted, I procured time for them to recover breath, by sending in a summons, requiring an unconditional surrender. During these transactions, Captain Jenkins had gallantly led on his column, and had been exposed to a heavy fire of seven guns, which he bravely attempted to take with the bayonet, though covered with 200 of the enemy's best troops: advancing as rapidly as the deep snow, and the exhausted state (in consequence) of his men would admit, he ordered a charge, and had not proceeded many paces, when his left arm was broken to pieces by a grape-shot; but still undauntedly running on with his men, he almost immediately afterwards was deprived of the use of his right arm by a discharge of case-shot; still heroically disregarding all personal consideration, he nobly ran on, cheering his men, to the assault, till exhausted by pain and loss of blood, he became unable to move. His company gallantly continued the charge, under Lieutenant M'Auley; but the reserve of militia not being able to keep up with them, they were compelled, by the great superiority of the enemy, to give way, leaving a few on a commanding position, and a few of the most advanced in the enemy's possession, nearly about the time that I gained the height above-mentioned. The enemy hesitating to surrender, I instantly carried his eastern battery, and by it silenced another which now opened again, and ordering on the advance the detachment of the king's and the Highland company of militia, under Captain Eustace, of the king's regiment, he gallantly rushed into the fort; but the enemy retreating by the opposite entrance, escaped into the woods, which I should effectually have prevented, if my Indian warriors had returned sooner from a detached service on which they had, that morning, been employed. I cannot close this statement without expressing my admiration of the gallantry and self-devotion of Captain Jenkins, who has lost one arm, and is in danger of losing the other. I must also report the intrepidity of Captain Lelievre, of the Newfoundland regiment, who had immediate charge of the militia under Colonel Fraser; of Captain Eustace, and the other officers of the king's regiment, and particularly of Lieutenant Ridge, of that corps, who very gallantly led on the advance; and of Lieutenant M'Auley and Ensign M'Donnell, of the Glengarry regiment; as also Lieutenant Ganguen, of the royal engineers; and of Ensign M'Kay, of the Glengarry light-infantry; and of Ensign Kerr, of the militia, each of whom had charge of a field-piece; and of Lieutenant Impey, of the militia, who has lost a leg. I was also well supported by Captain Fraser and the other officers and men of the militia, who emulate the conspicuous bravery of all the troops of the line. I enclose a list of the killed and wounded. The enemy had 500 men under arms, and must have sustained a considerable loss.

(Signed) "G. MACDONALD."

On the other hand, the city of York, the capital of Upper Canada, was captured by the Americans in April. General Dearborn, with a force of nearly 3,000 men, states, in a letter to the secretary at war, that arriving, by water, at the place in the morning of the 27th of April, he began landing the troops under a heavy fire. The British commander in York was General Sheaffe, whose force is stated at 700 regulars and militia, and 100 Indians. These he had stationed in the woods near the landing-place, and a spirited resistance was kept up, till the landing of General Pike with 7 or 800 men, and the approach to the shore of the remainder of the assailants, induced the British to retreat to their works. When the Americans had advanced within sixty rods of the main work of the town, an explosion took place from a magazine, which killed and wounded about 100 of the Americans and forty of the British. General Pike lost his life on this occasion, and was much regretted by the Americans as a brave and skilful officer.

BOOK XI.

CH. VIII.

1813.

In the mean time, Commodore Chauncey had worked into the harbour with his flotilla, and opened a fire upon the British batteries. It now became evident that the numbers of the British were inadequate to the task of defending York any longer against the vast superiority of force brought against it. General Sheaffe, therefore, soon after the explosion, marched out of the place with the regulars, and left the commander of the militia to capitulate. In consequence, all resistance immediately ceased, and the terms of surrender were agreed upon, by which all the military and naval men and officers, (about 300 in number) were made prisoners of war. Before the surrender, a large ship on the stocks and much naval stores had been set fire to, but a considerable quantity of military stores and provisions remained undamaged. The Americans, however, were forced to evacuate York in the following month.

This period was marked by an act of hostility on the part of the Americans against the Spaniards, which, at any other time, would probably have involved the two countries in a state of war. This was the capture of the fortress of Mobile, in West Florida. The Americans alleged, that this place was within the limits of the purchase of Louisiana by the United States, and which the Spaniards had hitherto retained on various pretexts. A detachment from General Harrison's army was therefore sent against it, which made a landing on the 12th of April. The commander advancing to the fort with scaling-ladders prepared for an assault, summoned the Spanish garrison to evacuate the place, with which requisition they complied, and were embarked for Pensacola. A numerous artillery and a considerable quantity of ammunition were found in the fortress.

In addition to the losses which the British navy had sustained by sea, in the commencement of the contest with the Americans, must be added, that of the destruction of the sloop of war Peacock, of eighteen guns. Captain Lawrence, of the American sloop of war Hornet, in his account of this unfortunate action, states, that in cruising from the coast of Surinam to that of Demerara, after making the latter, on the morning of the 24th of February, he discovered a vessel at anchor, apparently an English brig of war. On beating round a bank, in order to get to her, he descried another sail on his weather-quarter, edging down to him. This proved to be the Peacock; and after some manœuvring to get the weather-gage, in which the American succeeded, the action commenced about half-past five, p. m. Captain Lawrence ran his antagonist close on-board on the starboard-quarter, and kept up so heavy a fire, that in less than fifteen minutes, by his own account, but by that of some English who escaped, after an action of forty-five minutes, she surrendered, by hoisting a signal of distress. On sending a lieutenant on-board the Peacock, it was found that her commander, Captain Peake, was killed, and many other officers and men killed and wounded, and that the ship was sinking fast, having six feet water in her hold. Notwithstanding every endeavour to keep her afloat till the prisoners were removed, she went down, carrying with her thirteen of her crew, and three American sailors. Four of her men had previously taken her stern-boat, and got to land. The Peacock was considered as one of the finest vessels of her class, and appears to have entered into action with confidence of success. The Hornet, however, was of somewhat superior force, and her fire was described as truly formidable.

In order to destroy the trade of the Americans, a public ratification was issued by the prince-regent on the 30th of March, that necessary measures had been taken for blockading the ports and harbours of New York, Charleston, Port Royal, Savannah, and the river Mississippi. These were additional to the blockades of the Chesapeake and Delaware.

Admiral Sir J. B. Warren, being of opinion that a flotilla of small vessels might be usefully employed in penetrating the rivers at the head of Chesapeake bay, detached in April Rear-admiral Cockburn with a light squadron for that purpose. This officer made a successful attempt by the Fantome and Mohawk on French-town, a considerable distance up the Elk river, where was a depôt of stores. A resistance was made by a six-gun battery, but it was abandoned, and the town and stores left to their fate. The latter, consisting of flour and army necessities, together with five vessels, were burnt. In a few days afterwards, Admiral Cockburn attacked Havre-de-Grace, a place at the entrance of the Susquehanna, where the Americans had erected a battery. The attack was made by two divisions of seamen and marines, who drove the enemy from the battery and town, set fire to some houses of the latter, and then proceeded to a cannon-foundry at some distance, which they entirely destroyed, with a number of guns, and also took one hundred and thirty stand of arms. He afterwards made an attack upon George-town, and Frederick's-town. A body of four hundred militiamen, by whom they were defended, was soon dispersed, and the villages were destroyed, with the exception of the houses of some peaceable inhabitants who took no part in the hostilities. Some other places, in which there were no public stores or property, and no preparations made for resistance, were spared, and thus the expedition terminated. It was of no other consequence than as it might impress the minds of the people in those parts with a desire for the termination of hostilities.

The events of this war excited a considerable degree of interest in England, and, early in the year, ministers called the attention of parliament to the subject.

On the 18th of February, Lord Castlereagh rose in the House of Commons, and made a speech on the subject of the negotiations with America which had been laid before the house, concerning which, he said, that the chief point towards which their attention would be directed, was, whether it had been in the power of ministers, by any exertion, to have prevented the much-to-be-deprecated war in which we were now engaged. After expressing the great concern he himself felt at this occurrence, he said, that the question before the house was simply this, whether in this war justice was or was not on the side of Great Britain? and the proposition he meant to ground on their decision in the affirmative, was, that an address should be presented to the prince-regent, calling upon him to direct a vigorous prosecution of the war, with assurance of support from parliament. He then entered on a kind of commentary upon the regent's declaration, which will be found in our last chapter, in which all the arguments were repeated concerning the justice of the measures on the part of Great Britain that led to the hostile termination, which had been so often advanced during the negotiations. One circumstance of fact produced by his lordship may deserve to be recorded. The Americans, in their complaints against this country, had assumed, that Great Britain had impressed 15 or 20,000 of her citizens. But, upon particular enquiry by the admiralty, it had appeared, that out of 145,000 seamen employed in the British service in January 1811, the whole number claiming to be American subjects was 3,500; and, as it had been found that of the individuals advancing such claim, only about one in four could make it good upon examination, the real number would be reduced to 16 or 1700. He asked, then, if the house could believe that for such a consideration as 1700 sailors his majesty's government would irritate the feelings of a neutral nation, or violate public justice. After stating the particulars of the negotiations preceding the declaration of war, with a view of shewing that the British ministry had not been wanting in temper and due forbearance, and also that they had not been deficient in proper precautions against a possible hostile termination; his lordship concluded with moving, "that an humble address be presented to his royal highness the prince-regent, to acquaint his royal highness that we have taken into our consideration the papers laid before us by his royal highness's command, relative to the late discussions with the government of the United States of America: that whilst we deeply regret the failure of the endeavours of his royal highness to preserve the relations of peace and amity between this country and the United States, we entirely approve of the resistance which has been opposed by his royal highness to the unjustifiable pretensions of the American government, being satisfied that those pretensions could not be admitted without surrendering some of the most ancient, undoubted, and important rights of the British empire; that, impressed as we are with these sentiments, and fully convinced of the justice of the war in which his majesty has been compelled to engage, his royal highness may rely on our most zealous and cordial support in every measure which may be necessary for prosecuting the war with vigour, and for bringing it to a safe and honourable termination."

Mr. Ponsonby, after premising that he conceived the house was bound at present to support the crown in the prosecution of the war, observed, that from the papers laid before the house, three particular stages of negotiation were apparent. The first stage was, the overture made by Mr. Russell to the noble lord for an armistice, with the understanding, that during its continuance there was to be a negotiation between this country and America on the subject of impressment, and that, while it was pending, the right of impressment should be waived. This overture, he allowed, could not be admitted. The second was, the proposition that though no formal recognition of a suspension of the disputed right should take place, yet a secret understanding of that kind should be preserved between the two countries, till the matter in controversy was decided. This, also, he should have concurred with the noble lord in rejecting. The third stage presented a third overture, which, as he understood it, was made by Mr. Monroe to Sir John Warren, namely, that the question of impressment being the principal subject of dispute, an agreement on which might put an end to the war, the American government was willing to negotiate upon it flagrante bello, whilst this country was continuing to exercise its accustomed controul. Against this proposal he thought there could be no objection; for, though, in the prince-regent's declaration, as a reason against such a negotiation, it was observed that it would be commenced on the basis of receiving a legislative provision from a foreign state, in the place of a right which Great Britain had long been accustomed to exercise; yet it did not appear to him that this right was abandoned merely by entering into a negociation on the subject. The right honorable gentleman enlarged upon this point, and asked, was the war to be eternal? but if a treaty was ever to be made, it must be by means of negociation upon this very subject. He then touched upon the naval successes of America since the commencement of the war, which he could not but think showed some want of foresight and preparation in the ministers.

BOOK XI.

CH. VIII.

1813.

Mr. Baring said, that he did not believe that the noble lord's assertion was correct, that the American declaration of war had any connection with the state of France or Russia; and in his opinion the cause of the war was solely in the orders-of-council; and he appealed to Mr. Foster, the late ambassador to that country, and now sitting in the house, whether an earlier repeal of these orders would not have prevented the war. Now, however, the subject of impressment was the only obstacle to peace, and a most important one it was. He was sensible how much the safety of the country would be endangered by a surrender of the right without a sufficient substitute, and was aware of the great difficulty of finding such a substitute. He thought, however, that Mr. Russell's proposal ought to have been rejected in a more conciliatory manner, and the door not to have been shut against future negociation, with a phrase about maritime rights. The noble lord had stated that there were about 1,600 American seamen in our service; but had not noticed that there were at least ten times as many of British seamen in the service of America; which he mentioned, to show that it was even more for our interest than for that of America to court negociation on this point. He observed, that though there might be only 1,600 American seamen detained for life in our navy, it was no captious ground of complaint: it was a matter not to be settled by a balance of numbers, nor ought it to be regarded in that light. He then adverted to the conduct of the war, and held, that with our naval establishment we ought to have blockaded the whole American coast.

Mr. Foster then rose, and in reply to the appeal of the last speaker, said that he could not affirm that the revocation of the orders-in-council, previously to the commencement of hostilities, would have had the effect of averting them. Their repeal might have weighed something with the government, but he did not think that the government was sufficiently master of the congress to be able to do what it thought most beneficial for the country. He could not agree with the opinion of the honorable gentleman, that there was no party in America friendly to France: the revolution had made a strong impression there; and although the subsequent turn of affairs might have detached the better part from them, they were yet a powerful party. There was also an anti-anglican party, who took every opportunity to foment animosity against Great Britain. There were no fewer than six united Irishmen in the congress, distinguished by their inveterate enmity to this country. Mr. F. made many observations on the state of parties in America, and on its effect in producing the measures which had led to hostilities. The war, he said, was carried in congress by that rancorous faction against the English, who persuaded others to join them through fear that a difference might break up the democratic party; and in the senate the war measure was carried by the opponents of government, who were desirous of making it unpopular.

Mr. Whitbread was glad to have heard from the honorable gentleman, that neither Mr. Monroe or Mr. Madison seemed to him to be actuated solely by a spirit of hostility towards this country. The latter person had been much reviled by the noble lord and others for his attachment to the politics of France, but it now appeared that the war had been produced by causes beyond his controul. He could not consider America as being wholly to blame in the production of the war; and he was justified by a review of the history and progress of the preceding negociations to ascribe to the conduct of our own government the existing rupture between the two countries. On this point, Mr. W. entered into various particulars; and with respect to the American practice of naturalizing British-born subjects, and denationalizing them, he observed that there were two acts upon our statute-books by which every foreigner who served two years in any vessel, military or merchant, was entitled to every protection of a natural-born subject of this realm: and he apprehended that if an American had served two years in our navy, and the vessel in which he sailed was boarded by an American armed ship, which should claim him, he would be entitled to the protection of this country, and our government would have a right to refuse to give him up. Mr. W. then strongly reprehended the attempts to attribute the conduct of America on this occasion to French influence, and denied that she had ever declared in favour of France. If truth must be spoken, she had always been in the right in all her disputes with us until, by the declaration of war, she had changed her situation, and he hoped that this advantage which she had given us would be used on our parts with wisdom and discretion.

Mr. Canning, in a long and eloquent speech, in which he was frequently greeted with cheers, undertook the defence of the British government in its proceedings previous to the late negociations, and in the negociations themselves. With respect to the English acts relative to foreign sailors, referred to by Mr. W. he said that he had understood them only as granting municipal privileges to such persons, and by no means as impairing their native allegiance to their own sovereigns; and therefore that there was no similitude between these enactments and the pretensions of America in their naturalizations. With regard to the right of search, he repeated the arguments used in the regent's declaration against first abandoning a right of which we are in lawful possession, and then trusting to negociation for its restoration, or the substitution of an equivalent. But the topic on which he principally employed his eloquence, was an invective against the American government for having taken the time when great Britain was deeply engaged in the glorious struggle for the emancipation of Europe from tyranny, to impede her exertions, and league itself with the oppressor. Having thus declared his sentiments concerning the general grounds of the dispute between the two countries, he assumed his part of a censor of the present administration, by remarking on their want of vigour and decision in the measures which had followed the declaration of war.

After Mr. Croker had made some observations in defence of the conduct of the admiralty, and had stated some facts in proof of the misrepresentations and unfair proceedings of the Americans relative to the impressing of seamen; and a few words had been added by other members; the question was put, and carried without opposition.

A similar address being moved in the house of lords by Earl Bathurst, on Feb. 18th, the day for taking into consideration the papers relative to the war with America, a debate ensued, in which the arguments employed were so perfectly similar to those above reported, that it is unnecessary to particularize them. The address was carried without a division.

In the house of lords, on the 14th of May, the Earl of Darnley rose to call the attention of their lordships to our naval disasters. He said, he had hoped that during the interval between giving his notice and bringing forward his motion, something would have occurred to compensate the past disasters; but, on the contrary, another unfortunate event had been reported, attended with circumstances still more melancholy than the former ones. He alluded to the action between the British sloop of war Peacock, and the American brig Hornet of equal force. He should not now enter upon any question concerning the course or policy of the war, but it could not be disputed that ministers must have been long aware that war, sooner or later, must take place. This being the case, how were we prepared to meet it? With respect to Canada, the events there had greatly added to our military reputation, but they were events entirely unexpected. It was, however, with regard to our naval force that he should confine his inquiries. It appeared that from April to July in the last year, there were on the Halifax station, under Admiral Sawyer, exclusive of smaller vessels, one ship of the line and five frigates. That such a force only should have been stationed there, when a timely reinforcement might have achieved the most important objects, loudly called for inquiry. He was well informed that with five ships of the line, seventeen frigates, and an adequate number of smaller vessels, on that station, the whole coast of the United States might have been blockaded. It had been said that a sufficient force could not be spared for that purpose; but by sending to sea vessels which were lying useless, and taking one ship from each of the blockading squadrons, this might have been effected. It might be asserted that the force already on the Halifax station was equal to that of the American navy; but it had long been a matter of notoriety, that the American frigates were greatly superior to ours in size and weight of metal. If the war was inevitable, it was very extraordinary that government did not give orders for the construction of vessels able to cope with our antagonists. It would only be necessary to refer to dates to prove the criminal negligence of ministers. War was declared on the 18th of June, and it was not till October 13th that letters of marque and reprisal were issued; and more than two months longer elapsed before the Chesapeake and Delaware were declared to be blockaded. Certain other ports were declared to be blockaded on the 13th of March last, but Rhode Island and Newport remained open, and in the last the American frigate was refitted that took the Macedonian. In all the unfortunate cases, the cause was the same; the superior height of the enemy, and their greater weight of metal, by which our ships were crippled and dismasted early in the action, were circumstances surely deserving of inquiry. His lordship then called the attention of the house to the manner in which our trade had been left exposed to the depredations of the enemy; and he strongly reprobated the licences given by government for the importation of American cotton, thereby favoring their commerce to the detriment of our colonies. He then touched upon the mismanagement in our dock-yards; and upon the whole he contended that a case had been made out loudly demanding investigation. He concluded by moving, "That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the circumstances of the war with the United States, and more particularly into the state, conduct, and management of our naval affairs, as connected with it."

BOOK XI.

CH. VIII.

1813.

The motion was seconded by Earl Stanhope.

Lord Melville then rose and said, that though the conduct, and not the grounds of the war was the matter now to be considered, yet there was one circumstance connected with the declaration of it on which it was necessary to say a few words. Although the government of the United States had for some time before been in such a frame of mind as ultimately led to hostilities, yet a general opinion prevailed, that the revocation of the orders in council would have pacified it. He protested against the noble earl's proposition, that it was the duty of ministers always to have kept there a fleet sufficient to blockade all the ports in America.—There were other important branches of the service to which their attention was called, and our force on other stations was no more than sufficient, the blockading force in many places being less than the force blockaded. He had never met with a naval officer who entertained the opinion of the noble mover respecting the possibility of completely blockading the American ports. As to what he had said relative to the ships which had been opposed to the Americans, Lord Melville observed, that we were not to alter the classes of ships in the British navy merely because there were three American ships of unusual dimensions. All naval officers agreed in the opinion that it was not proper to multiply the classes of vessels; and it was far better to send out seventy-four's than to set about building ships only fit to cope with the American navy. The advice to diminish the number of small vessels was one in which no experienced person could concur, since these were peculiarly requisite to protect our trade against the enemy's privateers. The balance of capture was so far from being in favor of the Americans, that it was the reverse. With respect to not sooner issuing letters of marque, the delay was for the purpose of knowing the reception given by the Americans to our proposals of accommodation. As to the charge of mismanagement in the dock-yards, measures had been taken to remedy defects. Some of our ships, it was true, had undergone a rapid decay, through haste in the building; but it was necessary that our exertions should keep pace with those of the enemy.—For all these reasons he should give his vote against the motion.

Earl Stanhope made a speech chiefly relative to his own plans for the improvement of naval architecture. The most remarkable part was his reference to the contrivances of Mr. Fulton for blowing up ships under water, whose offers, he said, had been rejected by Bonaparte, but had been accepted by Mr. Pitt and Lord Melville, who, after his failure at Boulogne, made a compromise with him for a considerable sum, with which he went to America. Earl S. said, he had given a plan to the admiralty for preventing the effect of his inventions, which he thought of a formidable nature.

The Earl of Galloway entered into some professional remarks respecting the naval disasters of the American war, which he attributed very much to the power of the enemy to man their few large frigates with prime sailors; whereas the great demand for men in our navy had rendered it necessary to admit a large proportion of an inferior class. He touched upon the propensity of our seamen to desert, which he thought might be best obviated by an increase of petty officers made from the best among them, and by more liberal remuneration. He was also of opinion, in opposition to Lord Melville, that ships of precisely the same kind with those of the Americans should be built, in order to contend with them. He asserted that he should have approved of the motion had its object been not censure, but inquiry.

Earl Grey began with adverting to the contract of the admiralty with Mr. Fulton, and the compromise which he himself had negotiated, in the conviction that his invention would not prove of the smallest utility. He confessed, however, that such was his dislike to this mode of warfare, that he had passed many uneasy nights from the idea of its impracticability. He then made a number of remarks relative to the expediency of an inquiry on the present occasion, not only on account of our naval disasters, but the whole management of the American war. He dwelt particularly on the neglect in protecting the trade of the West Indies and of the coast of South America, and on the superiority of force which the Americans had been suffered to construct on the Canadian lakes.

Earl Bathurst defended the conduct of ministers upon similar grounds with those taken by Lord Melville.

Lord Grenville said, that the doctrine advanced by Lord Galloway, that inquiry implied censure, would lead to the abdication of all the functions of parliament; for no inquiry could be instituted, in that case, without incurring the guilt of condemning the parties unheard. He recapitulated some of the charges against ministry which had been already urged in support of the motion.

After the Earl of Liverpool had spoken in defence of the ministers, and the noble mover had briefly replied, the house divided, for the motion 59; against it, 125. Majority, 66.

CHAPTER IX.

United States of America.—Rapid Increase in Wealth and Population.—Commerce.—Political Parties.—Character of the Americans.—Number of Inhabitants.—State of the Army and Navy.—Satire upon American Discipline.—Political Life of Mr. Madison.—Biographical Sketch, and Character of Mr. Randolph.—Importance of Canada.—Its Military Force, Population, &c.

No country, perhaps, ever increased in population and wealth, or rose into importance, more rapidly than the United States of America. This may be traced to a variety of causes. During the last twenty years, great numbers of British subjects, disaffected to the government, or borne down by adverse circumstances, have sought the shores of America. The long continuance of a state of war in Europe has also greatly contributed to swell the lists of emigrants, who, carrying with them their arts and collective experience, have increased both their numerical force and political importance. To this may be added the advantages which they derived from neutral commerce when all Europe were engaged in war. Before hostilities commenced, their commerce was in the most flourishing state. According to an official document, which was laid before the house of representatives in 1808, the exports of the United States, from the 1st of October, 1806, to the 1st of October, 1807, were valued as follows:

The goods, wares and merchandize of	Dollars.
domestic growth or manufacture	48,699,592
Do. of foreign growth or manufacture	59,643,558

Total dollars - - 108,343,150

In this prosperous career, the Americans might have proceeded had they pursued a wise policy, and not involved themselves in a war which was foreign to their interests. The establishment of their independence has created an evident change in their moral as well as political character; and from this, no doubt, arises that self-consequence and conceit in the young American, which gives such an air of rude, licentious liberty to the mass of the people. This kind of liberty frequently proves more tyrannical in society than the occasional abuse of magisterial power in a monarchical government; for a man in the United States, if he does not happen to be on the popular side of the question, is often afraid to speak his sentiments, lest he should be abused and ill-treated. These political animosities and arbitrary conduct extend even to courts of justice, where the judges on the bench too often feel their contagious effects.

These political parties are distinguished under the titles of federal-republicans and democrats. Both parties view this country with considerable jealousy; but the democrats, who may be styled "the people," carry this to the extremity of the most confirmed and rancorous malice; rendered, indeed, comparatively impotent by its wildness and extravagance; while the federalists, who are in general the opulent, have more just and consistent views. The drinking of toasts at public dinners is a very common method of venting party spleen in America, and of drinking destruction to their enemies. The newspapers publish long lists of these toasts the next day, as so many proofs of patriotism and virtue; and take a pride in shewing how brilliantly their partizans can blackguard public characters in their cups.

An able writer has observed, that an obvious trait in the American character is vanity. Ostentatious and conceited in an eminent degree, the Americans will allow nothing to be excellent or praiseworthy in foreigners. All other men, Britons not excepted, are regarded by them with contemptuous disdain; and should one of the latter reside in America, or join in the society of her people, he will be soon informed, to his great surprise, that all British subjects are slaves and vassals, that tyranny and oppression pervade every department of the state, and that their own happy country, and admirable constitution, is the only resort for hopeless misery. There, men are all free; there alone the virtues flourish; and thither, as to a place of refuge, are the arts and sciences destined to flee, when the progress of tyranny in Europe shall have banished them thence. His astonishment would be increased by further hearing that the people of the "old country," meaning Great Britain, are degenerated, not only in moral virtue, but in physical power; and that they now are larger bodied, more brave, enlightened, and ingenious.

The Americans, in their commercial transactions, are exceedingly enterprising, which would deserve high commendation, were it always conducted on just and liberal principles; but the reverse is in general the case: fraud, smuggling, and perjury, are practised with success, and without reserve; and thus cupidity prevails among them to an astonishing degree. An eminent divine of Boston thus justly characterized his countrymen from the pulpit, on "putting away the easily besetting sin."—"There have existed at all times," said he, "not only personal and peculiar, but also national sins; for instance, among the ancients the Asiatics were accused of effeminacy, the Carthaginians of perfidy, &c. So among the moderns the French are said to be volatile and frivolous, the Spaniards proud and cruel, the English haughty, and evincing too great contempt for strangers; and we, my brethren, of being greedy of gain, and not over scrupulous how we obtain it."

BOOK XI.

CHAP. IX.

1812.

In America all are politicians, and every man a federalist or a democrat. The eagerness of the people for news far surpasses even that of this country. Newspapers are not charged with any duty, and seldom cost more than two-pence half-penny and about a halfpenny more for the carriage. Hence these vehicles of intelligence and information are accessible to every class of people in the states; and there is scarcely a poor owner of a miserable box hut, who lives on the borders of the stage-road, but has a newspaper left at his door. When politics are not the subject of conversation, no distinction between a federalist or a democrat can be discerned; but the moment it turns upon the conduct of a Jefferson or Adams, of the English and French nations, open war immediately commences, not only between rival politicians, but between friends and acquaintances.

Religious toleration is allowed in its fullest extent in every state of the Union; and people of every sect and form of worship are admitted to a share of the government. The population of the United States, which, in 1777, was estimated at 1,500,000, is now above 10,000,000. In 1808, the navy consisted of ten frigates and eighty-one sloops and gun-boats; the regular army amounted to no more than 2,000 men. But throughout the states, every able-bodied white male-citizen, between the age of eighteen and forty-five, is enrolled in the militia, and free people of colour are enrolled as pioneers. One-third of the militia may be marched out of each state by order of the executive of the United States, on particular emergencies, and under certain conditions; and treated in every respect the same as the regular troops, except that in cases of courts-martial the court is to be selected from the militia of the state. The militia of the United States, however, is for the most part badly disciplined. In general, they meet only to eat, drink, and make merry. The following excellent satire upon one of those meetings may afford our readers some amusement, and give them some idea of American tactics:—"I happened, not long since, to be present at the muster of a captain's company, in a remote part of one of the counties; and as no general description could convey an adequate idea of the achievements of that day, I must be permitted to go a little into the detail, as well as my recollection will serve me. The men had been notified to meet at nine o'clock, 'armed and equipped as the law directs,' that is to say, with a gun and cartouch-bæx at least; but, as directed by the law of the United States, 'with a good firelock, a sufficient bayonet and belt, and pouch with a box to contain not less than twenty-four sufficient cartridges of powder and ball.' At twelve o'clock about one-third, perhaps half, the men had collected; and an inspector's return of the number present would have stood nearly thus: one captain, one lieutenant, en-sign none, serjeants two, corporals none, drummers none, fifers none, privates present, twenty-five, ditto absent, thirty, guns fifteen, gunlocks twelve, ramrods ten, rifle pouches three, bayonets none, belts none, spare-flints none, cartridges none, horsewhips, walking-canes, and umbrellas, twenty-two.

"A little before one o'clock, the captain, whom I shall distinguish by the name of Clodpole, gave directions for forming the line of parade. In obedience to this order, one of the serjeants, the strength of whose lungs had long supplied the place of a drum and fife, placed himself in front of the house, and began to bawl with great vehemence, 'All Captain Clodpole's company to parade there! come, gentlemen, parade here! parade here!' says he, 'and all you that hasn't guns, fall into the lower end.' He might have bawled till this time, with as little success as the Syrens sung to Ulysses, had he not changed his post to a neighbouring shade; there he was immediately joined by all who were then at leisure; the others were at that time engaged either as parties or spectators at a game of fives, and could not just then attend: however, in less than half an hour the game was finished, and the captain was enabled to form his company, and proceed in the duties of the day.

"'Look to the right and dress!'

"They were soon, by the help of the non-commissioned officers, placed in a straight line; but as every man was anxious to see how the rest stood, those on the wings pressed forward for that purpose, till the whole line assumed nearly the form of a crescent. 'Whew! look at 'em!' says the captain, 'why, gentlemen, you are all crooking here at both ends, so that you will get on to me by and by: come, gentlemen, dress! dress!'

"This was accordingly done; but impelled, by the same motive as before, they soon resumed their former figure, and so they were permitted to remain. 'Now, gentlemen,' says the captain, 'I am going to carry you through the revolutions of the manual exercise, and I want you, gentlemen, if you please, to pay every particular attention to the word of command, just exactly as I give it out to you. I hope you will have a little patience, gentlemen, if you please, and I'll be as short as possible; and if I should be a-going wrong, I will be much obliged to any of you, gentlemen, to put me right again, for I mean all for the best, and I hope you will excuse me if you please. And one thing, gentlemen, I must caution you against, in particular, and that is this, not to make any mistakes if you can possibly help it, and the best way to do this, will be to do all the motions right at first, and that will help us to get along so much the faster, and I will try to have it over as soon as possible. Come, boys, come to a shoulder.

“Poise foolk!—Cock foolk!—Very handsomely done.—Take aim!—Ram down cartridge!—No No! Fire. I recollect now, that firing comes next after taking aim, according to Steuben; but with your permission, gentlemen, I’ll read the words of command just exactly as they are printed in the book, and then I shall be sure to be right.’ ‘O yes! read it, captain, read it,’ exclaimed twenty voices at once, ‘that will save time.’

“’Tention the whole then: please to observe, gentlemen, that at the word fire! you must fire; that is, if any of your guns are loaden’d, you must not shoot in yearnest, but only make pretence like; and all you gentlemen fellow-soldiers, who’s arm’d with nothing but sticks, and riding-switches, and corn-stalks, needn’t go through the firings, but stand as you are, and keep yourselves to yourselves.

“Half cock foolk!—Very well done.

“‘S, h, u, t, (spelling) shet pan!—That too would have been very handsomely done if you hadn’t have handled the cartridge instead; but I suppose you wasn’t noticing. Now ’tention, one and all, gentlemen, and do that motion again.

“Shet pan!—Very good, very well indeed, you did that motion equal to any old soldiers; you improve astonishingly.

“Handle cartridge!—Pretty well, considering you done it wrong end foremost, as if you took the cartridge out of your mouth, and bit off the twist with the cartridge-box.

“Draw rammer!—Those who have no rammers to their guns need not draw, but only make the motion; it will do just as well, and save a great deal of time.

“Return rammer!—Very well again—But that would have been done, I think, with greater expertness, if you had performed the motion with a little more dexterity.

“Shoulder foolk!—Very handsomely done, indeed, if you had only brought the foolk to the other shoulder, gentlemen. Do that motion again, gentlemen, and bring the foolk up to the left shoulder.

“Shoulder foolk!—Very good.

“Order foolk!—Not quite so well, gentlemen; not quite altogether: but perhaps I did not speak loud enough for you to hear me all at once; try once more if you please; I hope you will be patient, gentlemen, we will soon be through.

“Order foolk!—Handsomely done, gentlemen! very handsomely done! and altogether too, except that a few of you were a leetle too soon, and some others a leetle too late.

“‘In laying down your guns, gentlemen, take care to lay the locks up, and other sides down.

“’Tention the whole! Ground foolk!—Very well.

“Charge bagonet! (Some of the men)—‘That can’t be right, captain, pray look again, for how can we charge bagonet without our guns?’

“‘(Captain) I don’t know as to that, but I know I’m right, for here it is printed in the book c, h, a, r, yes, charge bagonet, that’s right, that’s the word, if I know how to read; come, gentlemen, do, pray, charge bagonet!’ Charge, I say! Why don’t you charge? Do you think it an’t so? Do you think I have lived to this time of day, and don’t know what charge bagonet is? Here, come here, you may see for yourselves; it’s as plain as the nose on your fa—stop—stay—no!—halt! no, no! faith I’m wrong! I’m wrong! I turned over two leaves at once. But I beg your pardon, gentlemen, we will not stay out long; and we’ll have something to drink as soon as we’ve done. Come, boys, get up off the stumps and logs, and take up your guns, and we’ll soon be done; excuse me if you please.

“Fix bagonet!

“Advance arms!—Very well done, turn the stocks of your guns in front, gentlemen, and that will bring the barrels behind; and hold them straight up and down if you please. Let go with your left hand, and take hold with your right just below the guard. Steuben says the gun must be held up p, e, r, perticular: yes, you must always mind and hold your guns very perticular. Now, boys, ’tention the whole!

“Present arms!—very handsomely done! only hold your guns over the other knee, and the other hand up, turn your guns round a leetle, and raise them up higher, draw the other foot back! Now you are nearly right. Very well done, gentlemen; you have improved vastly since I first saw you: you are getting too slick. What a charming thing it is to see men under good discipline! Now, gentlemen, we are come to the revolutions: but, Lord, men, how did you get into such a higlety-pigglety?

“The fact was, the shade had moved considerably to the eastward, and had exposed the right wing of these hardy veterans to a galling fire of the sun. Being but poorly provided with umbrellas at this end of the line, they found it convenient to follow the shade, and in huddling to the left for this purpose, they had changed the figure of their line from that of a crescent to one which more nearly resembled a pair of pothooks.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. IX.

1812.

" 'Come, gentlemen,' says the captain, 'spread yourselves out again into a straight line, and let us get into the wheelings and other matters as soon as possible.'

" But this was strenuously opposed by the soldiers. They objected to going into these revolutions at all, inasmuch as the weather was extremely hot, and they had already been kept in the field upwards of three quarters of an hour. They reminded the captain of his repeated promise to be as short as he possibly could, and it was clear he could dispense with all this same wheeling and flourishing if he chose. They were already very thirsty, and if he would not dismiss them, they declared they would go off without dismissal, and get something to drink; and he might fine them if that would do him any good; they were able to pay their fine, but could not go without drink to please any body; and they swore they would never vote for another captain who wished to be so unreasonably strict.

" The captain behaved with great spirit upon this occasion, and a smart colloquy ensued; when, at length, becoming exasperated to the last degree, he roundly asserted, that no soldier ought ever to think hard of the orders of his officer; and, finally, he went as far as to say, that he did not think any gentleman on that ground had any just cause to be offended with him. The dispute was, at length, settled by the captain's sending for some grog, for their present accommodation, and agreeing to omit reading the military law, as directed by a late act, and also all the military manœuvres, except two or three such easy and simple ones as could be performed within the compass of the shade. After they had drank their grog, and 'spread themselves' they were divided into platoons.

" "Tention the whole!—To the right wheel! Each man faced to the right about.

" 'Why, gentlemen, I didn't mean for every man to stand still and turn natyrally right round; but when I told you to wheel to the right, I intended for you to wheel round to the right as it were. Please to try that again, gentlemen; every right-hand man must stand fast, and only the others turn round.'

" In a previous part of the exercise it had, for the purpose of sizing them, been necessary to denominate every second person a 'right-hand man.' A very natural consequence was, that on the present occasion those right-hand men maintained their position, and all their intermediate ones faced about as before.

" 'Why look at 'em now!' exclaimed the captain in extreme vexation. 'I'll be d——d if you can understand a word I say.' Excuse me, gentlemen, but it rayly seems as if you couldn't come at it exactly. In wheeling to the right, the right-hand end of the platoon stands fast, and the other end comes round like a swingle tree. Those on the outside must march faster than those on the inside, and those on the inside not near so fast as those on the outside. You certainly must unders and me now, gentlemen; and now please to try once more.'

" In this they were a little more successful.

" 'Very well, gentlemen; very well indeed; and now, gentlemen, at the word wheel to the left, you must wheel to the left.'

" 'Tention the whole! To the left—left no—right—that is, the left—I mean the right—left, wheel! march!

" In this he was strictly obeyed; some wheeling to the right, some to the left, and some to the right, left, or both ways.

" 'Stop! halt! let us try again! I could not just then tell my right hand from my left; you must excuse me, gentlemen, if you please; experience makes perfect, as the saying is; long as I've served, I find something new to learn every day, but all's one for that: now, gentlemen, do that motion once more.'

" By the help of a non-commissioned officer in front of each platoon, they wheeled this time with considerable regularity.

" 'Now, boys, you must try to wheel by divisions, and there is one thing in particular which I have to request of you, gentlemen, and it is this, not to make any blunder in your wheeling. You must mind and keep at a wheeling distance; and not talk in the ranks, nor get out of fix again; for I want you to do this motion well, and not make any blunder now.'

" "Tention the whole! By divisions! to the right wheel! march!

" In doing this, it seemed as if bedlam had broke loose; every man took the command—'Not so fast on the right!—How now! how now!—Haul down those umbrellas!—Faster on the left!—Keep back a little in the middle there—Don't crowd so—Hold up you gun, Sam—Go faster, there!—Faster!—Who trod on me?—D——m your huffs, keep back! keep back!—Stop us, captain, do stop us—Go faster there—I've lost my shoe—Get up again—Ned, halt! halt! halt!—Stop, gentlemen! stop! stop!—

" By this time they got into utter and inexplicable confusion, and so I left them."

As Mr. Madison, the President of the United States, has generally been considered an enemy to this country, and a partizan of France, we shall here present the reader with the political life of that gentleman. He is considered as the pupil of Mr. Jefferson. He was but a youth at the early part of the revolution, yet was actively employed under his great leaders, Franklin, Jefferson, and others, in promoting the views of the republican party. His name appears as one of the deputies from Virginia in 1787, for the purpose of forming a new constitution; after which he was variously employed in the subordinate departments of the government, particularly during the secretaryship of Mr. Jefferson in 1793, when he brought forward his project of a commercial discrimination, for the purpose of imposing heavier duties on foreign goods, and promoting domestic manufactures. The French minister, Fauchet, says that Mr. Jefferson was the real author of the proposition thus introduced by Mr. Madison: at all events, it is certain that the former gentleman, in his capacity as secretary of state, had previously made a report to congress on the subject of commerce in the autumn of 1793.

In that report, Mr. Jefferson proposes the encouragement of domestic manufactures, and certain restrictions upon foreign commerce, particularly upon that of Great Britain, who, it seems, had imposed high duties on some of the American productions, and excluded others altogether from her ports. At that time there was no treaty of commerce between the two countries. Mr. Madison's proposition was therefore brought forward rather as a measure of retaliation than to favor any of the views of the French faction; though, in some measure, it unavoidably had that effect: consequently, it excited the violent opposition of the federal party, and was ultimately negatived. Every country, however, possesses a right to regulate its commerce in whatever manner is most to its own advantage. Great Britain had done this, and it was proposed that America should do the same; nor can we see in what shape either Mr. Jefferson or Mr. Madison can be charged with partiality to France on that score. The federalists, however, persisted in the opinion, that "their real object was to promote and foster the languishing manufactures of France, by an exclusion of those of Great Britain, at the expense of the United States." Fortunately for both countries, a treaty was shortly after concluded by Mr. Jay, who had been appointed envoy to England for that purpose; and thus the commerce and productions of each nation were put upon a reciprocal footing, without resorting to unpleasant and irritating measures.

From that period until he became secretary of state in Mr. Jefferson's presidency, Mr. Madison bore no very conspicuous part in public affairs; but on his entering upon that important office, his name became familiar to all who interested themselves in the affairs of America and the two great belligerent powers of Europe. The repeated disputes, and consequent explanations and negotiations, which have taken place between the three nations for several years past, have certainly given Mr. Madison full employment in his official capacity, and made him known to the world in the character of a diplomatician. The abilities which he has displayed are of no mean stamp; but he has exhibited in his diplomatic style of writing a studied obscurity and an intricate verbosity which seem to carry with it a desire in the writer to puzzle, perplex, and prolong the discussion of a business, which ought rather to have been candidly, fairly, and briefly stated, in order to its being brought to an immediate adjustment.

It has confessedly been the policy of Mr. Jefferson, and is also the policy of Mr. Madison, his successor, to negotiate rather than fight: hence we have an elucidation of the motives which have hitherto baffled the attempts of the British government to settle our disputes with America: for, had such a settlement taken place as we desired, the United States would inevitably have been plunged into a war with France. This it has been Mr. Jefferson's policy to avoid; in doing which, a show of hostility was necessarily obliged to be kept up towards England.

In the course of the disputes between the two parties on their differences with England and France, they have generally defended the proceedings of that nation to whom they were attached from political or party motives; but this contest has been carried on chiefly by newspaper politicians, and a few factious demagogues, mostly French or British renegadoes, whose inflammatory writings in favor of French principles have been imprudently patronized by the democratic Americans, and hence their party has incurred the severe but just animadversions of the federalists.

As to the great body of the American people, Mr. Lambert is of opinion that they are attached neither to England nor France, further than their own interest leads them; or, if any preference does exist, it is in favor of England, with whom they traffic to a greater extent than any other nation in the world, and with whose interests their own are so closely blended.

Their peculiar form of government, however, renders them liable to be divided in favour of one or other of their principal statesmen who offer themselves as candidates for the presidency. Hence they become split into parties, and range themselves under their favorite leaders. Europeans settled in the country, as foreigners or adopted citizens, naturally attach themselves to that side which is most congenial to their political sentiments; and the imprudent length which many of them have gone in divulging their opinions, has not only disgraced those who were connected with them, but has injured the American character in the eyes of foreign nations.

An American writer, speaking of the impressment of American seamen by the British ships of war, acknowledges that protections are indiscriminately granted to foreigners in the American service. "It must not be forgotten," says he, "that certificates bearing testimony of a seaman's being an American citizen are very easily obtained by a little hard swearing. A dollar and a false oath very often transform a foreigner into an American; and if this ready-made countryman of ours be impressed into a British ship, we clamour loudly about the cruelty and injustice of British naval officers.

"Not many months since, an English lad, not quite nineteen, who had deserted from a British man of war, wished to go out from New York to the East Indies, as seaman, with an American captain. The captain represented the danger of his being impressed by the British, and advised him, at all events, to go and get a certificate of his being a native American. The seaman followed this advice, and returned within a few hours, flourishing a certificate, testifying he was born in America. The captain asked him how he got it. The seaman told him, that he went into the street and found an Irishman, whom he asked to go along with him to the proper officer, and swear that he was born in America; to which the Irishman agreed, and the sailor got the certificate. The captain asked him how much he gave the Irishman. 'Two dollars,' says the sailor. 'That was too much,' replied the other, 'you should have got him to do it for half.' 'Why,' says the sailor, 'I tried to beat him down to a dollar; but he insisted upon it, that two dollars were little enough in all conscience for a false oath, and that he would not perjure himself for less!'"

The biography of Mr. John Randolph, an eminent character in the United States, and the avowed friend of this country, cannot fail to be interesting. This gentleman, whose name many persons have confounded with that of Edmund Randolph, is a native of Virginia, and born of a very respectable family. Bred up to the profession of the law, attached to antifederal principles, he came into office under Mr. Jefferson's administration. Previous to this Mr. Randolph had, for several years, been a member of Congress; and upon several occasions during Mr. Adams's presidency he contrived materially to turn the current of popular opinion from the federalists to his party.

The indiscreet and intemperate warmth shown by the ruling party towards Great Britain, and their apparently tame acquiescence in the measures of Bonaparte, at length disgusted Mr. Randolph. He began by rebuking Mr. Madison, at that time secretary of state, for acceding to the demand of Turreau, the French ambassador; on which occasion Mr. Madison replied, "that France was in want of money, and must have some from the United States." The pretext was payment for the Floridas and Louisiana. This shuffling conduct occasioned Mr. Randolph to withdraw himself from the confidence of President Jefferson, and he then repeatedly told the house, that there no longer existed a cabinet-council.

Since then he has taken an active part in opposition to the measures of the democratical party, without absolutely joining the federalists. In thus steering a middle course he has been joined by many other members, who, under his auspices, have lately risen into public notice and esteem. Among them the names of Gardenir, Key, Dana, Otis, and Quincy, are the most conspicuous. In many instances Mr. Randolph's speeches have been favorable to English measures and principles, as opposed to those of France; yet, nevertheless, he possessed that amor patriæ which consults only the good of his own country.

The integrity and virtue of this eminent character are sufficiently substantiated by his sentiments respecting the late Mr. Crowninshield's proposition for cancelling the national debt in case of war with England. "The gentleman from Massachusetts," says Mr. Randolph, "is for spunging the national debt. I can never consent to it. I will never bring the ways and means of fraudulent bankruptcy into your committee of supply. Confiscation and swindling shall never be found among my estimates to meet the current expenditure of peace and war. No, Sir, I have said with the doors closed, and I say so when they are open, 'Pay the public debt.' Get rid of that dead weight upon your government that cramps all your measures, and then you may set the world at defiance. So long as it hangs upon you, you must have revenue, and to have revenue you must have commerce—commerce, peace."

Acting up to these patriotic and virtuous principles, Mr. Randolph was induced to bring forward a series of charges against General Wilkinson for corruption, in having received money at various times from the Spanish government at New Orleans in aid of traitorous practices against the United States. One of the documents which Mr. Randolph presented to the house on that occasion, is as follows:

Translation.

"In the galley the Victoria, Bernardo Molina patron, there have been sent to Don Vincent Folch, nine thousand six hundred and forty dollars, which sum, without making the least use of it, you will hold at my disposal, to deliver it at the moment an order may be presented to you by the American general, Don James Wilkinson. God preserve you many years!

"The Baron de CARONDELET.

"New Orleans, 20th January, 1796."

"I certify that the foregoing is a copy of its original, to which I refer.

(Signed) "THOMAS PORTELL.

"New Madrid, 27th June, 1796."

Mr. Randolph, upon this and other documents, impeached Wilkinson of being a Spanish pensioner, and pledged himself to prove the charges which he brought against him. A motion was accordingly made to request the president to institute an inquiry into Wilkinson's conduct. In the mean time, Wilkinson challenged Randolph, who replied, that he would not fight him till he had cleared up his character: in consequence of which, the general posted an advertisement up in different parts of the city of Washington, proclaiming John Randolph a prevaricating poltroon and scoundrel.

Mr. Randolph, however, displayed his courage and magnanimity by treating this libel with contempt; and patriotically continued to persevere in the investigation of this unpleasant business. At the examination of witnesses Mr. Randolph, on introducing Mr. Clark's affidavit, said, "The proofs, Mr. Speaker, which have this day been produced against your general-in-chief, together with what I hold in my hand, will convince you, sir, and the world, that he is a base traitor. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, that this poison, this infectious, corrupted disease, is not confined to your general alone; it has, to the disgrace of the American character, I am sorry to say, extended to the army under your general's command! The very stores which descended the Ohio for the Burr conspiracy, were taken, sir, from the American arsenal!"

If this last allegation is true, and it never has been contradicted, we may easily account for the acquittal of General Wilkinson, which afterwards took place. A military court of inquiry was instituted by the president to investigate the charges against him. They acquitted him of all corrupt practices; but acknowledged that he had, at various times, received large sums of money from the governor of New Orleans for tobacco! Excellent management! We think they order these matters better in America than in Europe.

Mr. Randolph's figure is ordinary and forbidding: tall, lean, pale, and emaciated; he repulses rather than invites. His voice is somewhat feminine; but that is little noticed in the moment he has entered fully upon his subject, whether it be at the convivial table or at the house of representatives. The defects of his person are then forgotten in one continued blaze of shrewd, sensible, and eloquent remarks. By a manner peculiar to himself, he arrests the wandering attention of his auditors, and rouses every slumbering faculty of the mind. The reasoning of Mr. Randolph is never strong and forcible; having a genius which despises the shackles of restraint, he throws off, in the paroxysms of feeling, the chains of argumentation, and ranges, as it were, with a quickened pace and gladdened heart through the wide field of general remark. If forced into a subtle and intricate discussion by his opponents, he yields with infinite reluctance to the imperious necessity of speaking to the judgment, without being permitted to charm and captivate the imagination. Yet, nevertheless, when he exhibits his subject naked, it has the nerve of Hercules, and is not relieved by a single feature of Adonis.

With the most powerful talents, with superior cultivation of mind, and with the most unsuspecting sincerity in the expression of all his opinions, Mr. Randolph is not calculated for a popular leader. The arts of conciliation are unknown to him. Governed by the dictates of his own manly judgment, he cannot conceive that dependence which shackles weaker minds. It is thus that he never has been known to consult, to advise, or to compromise. His propositions are original: they are brought forward without one inquiry of who is to support, or who is to oppose them. Conscious of the purity of his own intentions, and satisfied with the correctness of his own judgment, he wishes not to defend the one, he seeks not to confirm the other, by his personal popularity.

Individually, there is no man in the district where he resides who is not better known, or whose manners and public habits are not more pleasing to the people, than Mr. Randolph's. It is probable, that if his election were put on that issue, he would never have held a seat in congress. About him there is an atmosphere of repulsion which few dare to penetrate; but he who has the firmness to do it is eminently rewarded. Ardent and affectionate in his disposition, he is susceptible of strong and permanent affection: but if injured, he exhibits but little of that mild forbearance which is inculcated in the gentle precepts of our holy religion. His private history, however, abounds with evidences of the most humane and philanthropic feeling. One trait in his character denotes his inclination to live in peace and friendship with those around him; he never will converse upon political subjects but with the greatest reluctance, well knowing what acrimony and discord they create, even between the warmest friends.

Although Mr. Randolph possesses general information, he cannot be considered a literary character. Except a minute knowledge of history and geography, his reading has been otherwise superficial. The wit of Mr. Randolph is keen, and too often indulged without regard to its effects on the feeling of others. Sometimes, however, its application is peculiarly happy. Dr. Dana, proverbial for his pedantry, once observed, in the presence of Mr. Randolph, that they were waiting for their stalking library (alluding to Dr. Mitchill): "Sir," said Randolph, "I heard him just now inquire for his index." The adversaries of Mr. Randolph have lately attempted to dishearten him by contumely and vulgar abuse; but he very properly refuses to be drawn into personal conflicts with whole hosts of enemies, who wish to drown their vengeance in his blood. "May he live long," says one of his friends, "and never cease to lash corruption with a calm disdain!"

BOOK X.

CHAP. IX.

1813.

Of all the colonies of Great Britain, none is of such vital importance as her North American provinces; partly because they employ the greatest quantity of shipping, and also as being capable of supplying the mother-country, and her other dependencies, with an abundance of the articles necessary for her wants and enjoyments. The possessions of the British in North America, are Labrador, Upper and Lower Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. Of these provinces, in a political point of view, the two Canadas are of the most importance, in consequence of their vicinity to the territories of the United States.

Upper and Lower Canada have rapidly improved, but not in proportion to their neighbours, for colonies have not the vigour and spirit of independent states. The population of the two provinces is estimated at 350,000. Their commerce has increased wonderfully of late years. Even in 1808, the number of shipping that cleared out from Quebec alone amounted to 334, laden principally with timber, potash, pitch, tar, and turpentine; wheat, flax-seeds, staves, &c. The tonnage was 70,275, and the number of seamen 3,330. The exports were valued at 1,156,060*l.*; and the imports at 610,000*l.*; thus leaving a balance in favor of the colony of 546,060*l.* Canada supplies Great Britain with hemp, and every other description of naval stores. Having originally been a French colony, the majority of the inhabitants of the lower province are descendants from the French. The wise and beneficent measures, however, which have been pursued towards them, have tended to conciliate them to the British government. French as well as English, catholics as well as protestants, are all unanimous in defence of their country.

Every man throughout the Canadas is a soldier; and during the last campaign, every one of them cheerfully attended the call of arms. This interesting fact cannot but convey to the mind the most pleasing sensations; since we find a nation of ancient foes, both in politics and religion, now united in the strictest friendship, and vying with each other who shall display the greatest ardour in protecting that government under which they have enjoyed so much happiness.

Quebec is the capital of Lower Canada, the fortifications of which are extremely strong, being considered a second Gibraltar. While the British hold possession of this place, the Americans can never make any impression upon the country. The Americans, however, were so confident of success, when they invaded Canada, in 1812, that General Dearborn had actually prepared a triumphal coat, richly decorated with oak leaves, as the victor's mead, which was destined to be worn on entering Quebec. The popular toast was, "May the army eat its Christmas dinner in Quebec." Indeed, one of the arguments used in congress on behalf of a declaration of war, was the ease and certainty with which these provinces would be conquered. It was even represented, that the provincials would not resist, but meet their invaders and recognise in them deliverers from tyranny and oppression; or that if, contrary to expectation, they did resist, they might, when conquered, be retained as a pledge, to secure more favorable terms of peace. Britain, it was said, "would make any sacrifice rather than leave valuable colonies in the enemy's hands," while, among the many curious speculations that were made of the importance of these provinces to the United States, it was estimated that the coal alone of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia would repay the expenses of a seven years war.

The militia of Upper and Lower Canada amounts to 60,000 effective men. The province of Upper Canada, which has borne the chief brunt of this unnatural contest, was, before the former war, nearly one vast wilderness: a few forts and small settlements for the convenience of the fur-trade, were all that relieved that gloomy appearance of interminable forests and immense lakes. Since the conclusion of that war, the settlement and cultivation of this province have been an object of much attention on the part of the British government. The loyalists who were driven from the United States, found here a comfortable asylum, and, together with numerous families who emigrated from Scotland, soon formed a respectable colony. The settlements were also considerably increased by the disbanded officers and soldiers who had served in America. These people received large grants of land from government as a reward for their services, and either cultivated the spots themselves, or sold them to others who did. This zeal for peopling the upper province met with every encouragement from home, as it tended to form a strong barrier against any future invasion from the neighbouring states. Towns of considerable magnitude were in a few years constructed upon the sites of old forts and blockhouses; and the shouts of hunters and the Indian war-hoop gave place to the busy hum of trade and commerce. The lakes became covered with ships instead of canoes; and every town resembled a sea-port. The principal lakes of this province are called Ontario, Erie, and Superior.

They are capable of receiving the largest fleets: one of them, viz. Superior, is upwards of 400 miles in length, and 1,500 in circumference. The depth of these vast lakes, in many places, cannot be ascertained; and the storms, which frequently occur, are often more destructive than those which happen on the ocean.

The climate of Upper Canada is more mild and temperate than that of the lower province, and for that reason is preferred to the latter by most of the European emigrants who proceed to North America. Vegetation of all kinds is most abundant; the harvests are extremely luxuriant; and, by many people, Upper Canada is termed the garden of North America. The English laws entirely prevail in this province. The taxes are very trifling; and any man with a small sum of money has it in his power to acquire a very handsome competency. The manners, customs, and amusements of the inhabitants resemble those of the British nation.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. IX.

1813.

CHAPTER X.

Report of Committee of Foreign Relations.—President's Message to Congress.—Order of the Marshal of New York.—Action on the Miami.—Capture of Fort George.—Attack on Sackett's Harbour.—Defeat of the Americans at Burlington Heights.—Proclamation of Sir George Prevost.—Capture of Colonel Boestler and his Troops by the British.—Landings in the Chesapeake.—Capture of the Islands of Portsmouth and Ocracoke.—Capture of the American Frigate Chesapeake by the Shannon.—Message of the President to Congress.

On the 29th of January, a report was laid before the house of representatives from the committee of foreign relations, which merits attention, as stating the grounds of the war with Great Britain, and the causes which produced the failure of the attempts that were made for its extinction. Having noticed the refusal of Mr. Madison to concur in the proposal for an armistice made by Admiral Warren, because nothing was said in it on the subject of impressment, the committee express their entire approbation of his conduct, observing, that, "to appeal to arms in defence of a right, and to lay them down without receiving it, would be considered in no other light than a relinquishment of it." They then proceed to consider the precise nature of that cause which has hitherto prevented an accommodation. "Great Britain," they say, "claims a right to impress her own seamen, and to exercise it in American vessels. It insists that every American seaman should carry with him the evidence of his citizenship, and that all those who are unprovided with such evidence should be impressed. Not to object that such a document may be lost or destroyed, on what principle does the British government require from the United States such a degradation? Ought the free citizens of an independent power to carry an evidence of their freedom on the main ocean, and in their own vessels, and are all to be considered as British subjects who do not bear with them that badge? Would Great Britain herself submit to such an usurpation of authority?" After some more observations on this point, they go on to say, "Let it be distinctly understood, in case of an arrangement between the two nations, whereby each should exclude from its service the citizens and subjects of the other, that this house will be prepared, so far as depends on it, to give it effect: and for that purpose to enact laws, with such regulations and penalties as will be adequate." They consider it as the duty of the house to declare, in the most decisive terms, that should the British government decline such an arrangement, and persist in the practice of impressment from American vessels, the United States will resist it unceasingly with all their force. The report dwells with a good deal of prolixity on this topic, touching upon no other point of difference between the two nations; and it concludes by recommending the passing of a bill "for the regulation of seamen on-board public vessels, and in the merchants' service, of the United States."

A proclamation, issued by the governor of Bermuda, reciting a British order-of-council, providing for the supply of the West India islands by a trade under special licenses from the ports of the United States, but confining such licenses to those of the eastern states exclusively, gave great offence to Mr. Madison. On the 24th of February, he sent a message to congress, couched in terms of indignation and reproach, which denoted the acuteness of his feelings, with respect to any attempt for separating the interests of different parts of the union, and particularly when favoring that part in which he was conscious of being unpopular. He suggested to Congress the expediency of a prohibition of any trade whatever by the citizens of the United States, under special licenses, and also a prohibition of all exportation from the United States in foreign bottoms.

BOOK XI.
CHAP. X.
1813.

The address breathed a keen spirit of resentment against the British nation; and, in fact, the war this year exasperated the feelings on both sides, and produced altercations, hereafter to be mentioned, scarcely compatible with civilized hostility. The Congress closed its session on the 5th of March, without passing the prohibitory bills recommended by the president.

On the 4th of March, an order was issued by the marshal of the district of New York, for compelling all British merchants, residing within forty miles of the American coast, to retire beyond that distance into the interior; thus forcing them to break up their establishments, to desert their property, and to seek new situations, without affording them the means of support: in short, rendering them prisoners of war, without the protection and assistance which all civilized governments feel themselves bound to extend to persons in that unfortunate situation: and yet Mr. Madison, in his speech at the capital, had the modesty to assert, that the war, on the part of the American government, was waged in a spirit of liberality which was never surpassed.

A party of the American army having taken post near the foot of the rapids of the Miami, a river flowing into Lake Erie, Colonel Proctor, on the 23d of April, embarked with a force of regulars and militia, consisting of between eight and nine hundred, to whom were joined about twelve hundred Indians, and sailed for the Miami. In consequence of heavy rains he was not able to open his batteries till the 1st of May, at which time the enemy had so well secured himself, by blockhouses and batteries, that no impression could be made on him. Whilst Colonel Proctor was still lying there, a reinforcement of American troops, to the amount of 1,300, under the command of Brigadier-general Clay, descending the river, made a sudden attack upon him, aided by a sally of the garrison. For a few minutes the enemy was in possession of his batteries, and took some prisoners; but after a severe though short contest, they were repulsed, and the greatest part, except the party from the garrison, were killed or taken. Their loss was estimated at between 1,000 and 1,200 men, of whom about 500 were prisoners. The killed, wounded, and missing of the British did not exceed 100. In this decisive affair, the officers and men of the 41st regiment charged and acted with distinguished gallantry. Colonel Proctor, however, in consequence of being deserted by half of the militia, and nearly all the Indians, was not able to preserve his situation at the Miami.

In the mean time, the Americans having collected a powerful force by land and water, at the head of Lake Ontario, proceeded against Fort George, on the Niagara, which they cannonaded from their ships and batteries the whole of the 24th and 25th of May. On the 27th, at day-break, under cover of their fleet, which kept up a tremendous and most destructive fire, they succeeded in landing a body of troops, and advanced to the attack of the place. They were very gallantly opposed by the British troops, notwithstanding their superiority in numbers; and a judicious position was occupied by Lieutenant-colonel Myers, which checked their progress. That zealous and meritorious officer, however, was obliged to quit the field, having received three wounds; but being replaced by Lieutenant-colonel Harvey, the unequal contest continued some time longer, with unshaken gallantry and determination. At length Colonel Vincent, the commander, considering further perseverance against an overwhelming force a fruitless sacrifice of invaluable lives, having gained by their intrepid resistance the means of dismantling the fort, and destroying the stores, he directed the troops to fall back on Queenston, which was done with perfect order. The loss of the British, in this affair, amounted to about 300 in killed, wounded, and missing. Colonel Vincent, in his retreat, was joined by Lieutenant-colonel Bishopp, with all the detachments from Chippawa to Fort Erie, and by other parties, which augmented his force to about 1,600 men. With them he took up a position near the head of the lake. The American army, meanwhile, pushed on a considerable detachment towards Queenston. Its whole force was estimated at nearly 10,000 men, which rendered them complete masters of the Niagara frontier.

About the close of May, an attempt upon the American port at Sackett's harbour was planned by Sir George Prevost, and its execution was committed to Colonel Baynes, aided by a fleet of boats under Sir James Yeo. On the night of the 28th, the expedition, composed of draughts from different regiments, and a company of Glengarry light-infantry, proceeded from Kingston to the harbour, hoping to land before the enemy should be sufficiently apprized of the attack, to line the woods on the coast with troops; but a strong current and the darkness of the night frustrated this purpose, so that at the dawn of day the Americans were fully prepared for their reception. It was the intention of Colonel Baynes to have landed in the cove formed by Horse Island, but finding the enemy prepared, he directed the boats to pull round to the other side of the islands, where a landing was effected in good order and with little loss, although executed in the face of a corps formed with a field-piece in the wood, and under the enfilade of a heavy gun of the enemy's principal battery. The advance was led by the grenadiers of the 100th regiment, with undaunted gallantry, which no obstacle could arrest: a narrow causeway, in many places under water, not more than four feet wide, and about 400 paces in length, which connected the island with the main land, was occupied by the enemy in great force with a 6-pounder. It was forced and carried in the most spirited manner, and the gun taken before a second discharge could be made from it: a tumbril, with a few rounds of ammunition, was found; but, unfortunately, the artillerymen were still behind, the schooner in which they were embarked not having been able to get up in time; and the troops were exposed to so heavy and galling a fire from a numerous, but almost invisible foe, as to render it impossible to halt for the artillery to come up. At this spot, two paths led in opposite directions round the hill. Colonel Baynes directed Colonel Young, of the king's regiment, with half of the detachment, to penetrate by the left, and Major Drummond, of the 104th, to force the path by the right, which proved to be more open and was less occupied by the enemy. On the left the wood was very thick, and was most obstinately maintained by the enemy.

The gun-boats, which had covered the landing, afforded material aid, by firing into the woods; but the American soldier, secure behind a tree, was only to be dislodged by the bayonet. The spirited advance of a section produced the flight of hundreds—from this observation all firing was directed to cease, and the detachment being formed in as regular order as the nature of the ground would admit, pushed forward through the wood upon the enemy, who, although greatly superior in numbers, and supported by field-pieces, and a heavy fire from their fort, fled with precipitation to their block-house and fort, abandoning one of their guns. The division under Colonel Young was joined in the charge by that under Major Drummond, which was executed with such spirit and promptness, that many of the enemy fell in their enclosed barracks, which were set on fire by the British troops. The Americans had previously set fire to their store-houses in the vicinity of the fort. But as it was impossible for the expedition, with the means it possessed, to attain any further object; and the troops being exposed to a heavy fire from the enemy's cannon, they were re-embarked, with the loss of about 260 in killed, wounded, and missing.

Although the failure of this expedition tended to inspire the Americans with considerable confidence, yet the gallantry and good conduct of the British troops was never more conspicuous than on this occasion; and but one sentiment of regret and mortification prevailed on being obliged to quit a beaten enemy, whom a small band of British soldiers had driven before them for three hours, through a country abounding in strong positions of defence, but not offering a single spot of cleared ground favorable for the operations of disciplined troops, without having fully accomplished the duty they were sent to perform.

On the 3d of June, the British gun-boats on Lake Ontario, supported by detachments from the garrison of Isle au Noix, captured two American armed vessels, of eleven guns and fifty men each.

An action took place on the 6th, greatly to the credit of the British troops, at Burlington Heights, near the head of Lake Ontario, where Colonel Vincent was posted with a division of troops. Receiving information that the Americans had advanced from Forty Mile Creek with 3,500 infantry and 250 cavalry, with eight pieces of artillery, for the purpose of attacking him, he sent Lieutenant-colonel Harvey, with two light companies, to reconnoitre, and from his report was led to determine upon a nocturnal attack of the enemy's camp, about seven miles distant. Accordingly, about half-past eleven, he moved forwards with the fifth company of the 8th (or king's) and the 49th regiments, amounting altogether to only 704 firelocks; Lieutenant-colonel Harvey, who conducted it with great regularity and judgment, gallantly led on the attack. The enemy was completely surprised, and driven from his camp, after having repeatedly formed in different bodies, and been as often charged by the British troops, whose conduct throughout this brilliant enterprise was above all praise. The action terminated before day-light, when three guns, and one brass howitzer, with three tumbrils, two brigadier-generals, Chandler and Winder, first and second in command, and upwards of 100 officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, were made prisoners.

Not conceiving it prudent to expose our small force to the view of the enemy, who, though routed and dispersed, was still formidable as to numbers and position, Colonel Vincent ordered the troops back to their cantonments. After the British had retired, and it had become broad day, the enemy ventured to re-occupy his camp, only, however, for the purpose of destroying his incumbrances, such as blankets, carriages, provisions, spare arms, ammunition, &c. after which he commenced a precipitate retreat towards the Forty Mile Creek, where he effected a junction with a body of 2,000 men, who were on their march from Niagara to reinforce him.

The appearance of the squadron of Sir James Yeo, off Forty Mile Creek, determined the Americans to a further retreat, in which almost the

BOOK XI.

CHAP. X.

1813.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. X.

1813.

whole of their camp-equipage, and a quantity of stores and provisions, fell into the hands of their adversaries. General Dearborn afterwards concentrated his forces at Fort George; and Colonel Vincent, in consequence, made a forward movement from the head of the lake in order to support the light-infantry and Indians who were employed in cutting off the supplies of the Americans.

On the 14th of June, Sir George Prevost issued the following proclamation, in answer to one from the American colonel, Preston, in which that officer had addressed the inhabitants of Upper Canada as a conquered people.

"His excellency the commander of the forces having seen a public declaration made by Lieutenant-colonel P. Preston, of the 12th regiment of the United States infantry, dated at Fort Erie, the 30th of May last, in which he professes to hold out the protection of the United States to all those who shall come forward and voluntarily enrol their names with him, and threatening with rigorous and disastrous consequences those who shall have the spirit and loyalty to pursue a different course of conduct; his excellency deems it necessary to caution his majesty's subjects in this province against listening to this insidious offer of the enemy, or trusting to their assurances of protection, which subsequent events have clearly proved they are so little able to afford to themselves. With the bare possession of a narrow strip of our frontier territory, not obtained by them without a severe contest and corresponding loss, with an unconquered and unbroken army in their front, at an inconsiderable distance from them, and ready to dispute every inch of ground over which they should attempt to advance into the country, it was hardly to be expected that the enemy's presumption would have led them to consider themselves as in the possession of this province, or have induced them contrary to the established usages of civilized warfare, to treat its peaceable inhabitants as a conquered people.

"The brilliant result of the action of the 6th instant, the rout and complete dispersion of a large division of the enemy's forces on that day, attended with the capture of their artillery and of their ablest generals, their subsequent retreat and flight, with the loss of the whole of their baggage, provisions, and tent-equipage, before the victorious army of Brigadier-general Vincent, daily increasing in strength from the powerful reinforcements reaching it, and assisted by the squadron under Sir James Yeo, now in undisturbed possession of the lake; all these events, which followed in rapid succession within a very few days after Lieutenant-colonel Preston's declaration, shew more strongly than any language can possibly describe, the futility of the offers held out by it, and produce the strongest incentive to his majesty's subjects to hold fast that allegiance from which the enemy would so insidiously withdraw them.

"His excellency, therefore, confidently calls upon all the loyal and well-disposed in this province, who are not under the immediate controul, or within the power of the enemy, to use every possible effort in repelling the foe, and driving him from our soil, assuring them that they will be powerfully aided by the reinforcements daily arriving at this post, and pressing on to their support. To those of his majesty's subjects who are unfortunately situated within that inconsiderable portion of the territory occupied by the enemy, his excellency recommends a quiet and peaceable conduct, such as shall neither afford a just cause to the enemy for treating them with the severity and rigour they have threatened, or incompatible with their allegiance to the best of sovereigns. His excellency, at the same time, declares, that he shall be compelled, however reluctantly, instantly to retaliate upon the American prisoners in his possession, every violation of the persons or property of any of his majesty's subjects so peaceably demeaning themselves, and hereby publicly protests against such treatment, as equally unsanctioned by the usages of war, or by the example afforded by his majesty's forces with regard to any of the American prisoners in their possession."

An occurrence took place, on the 24th of June, which General Dearborn termed unfortunate and unaccountable. That officer had detached, on the evening of the 23d, Lieutenant-colonel Boestler, with 570 men, to march by the way of Queens-ton to the Beaver Dams, eight or nine miles thence, in order to disperse a body of British collected there for the purpose of procuring provisions. This detachment was attacked by the Indians, from an ambuscade in the woods, and retired to clear grounds, whence the commander sent express for a reinforcement. Meanwhile, Lieutenant Fitzgibbon arriving with a British force, the American leader seemed to have lost his presence of mind, and without waiting for succours, agreed to a capitulation, by which two field-officers, twenty-one other officers, twenty-seven non-commissioned officers, and 482 privates were surrendered prisoners of war, with their colours and field-pieces.

About this time, Admiral Sir J. B. Warren, lying in the Chesapeake, on the intelligence that the enemy were fortifying Craney-island, the possession of which was necessary to enable the light vessels to proceed up the narrow channel towards Norfolk, directed a body of troops, under Sir Sidney Beckwith, to land on the nearest point to that place; but upon approaching the island, the shallowness of the water, and the strength of the enemy's defences, rendered the enterprize too difficult to be undertaken with any prospect of success. In consequence, the troops were ordered back, after some loss had been sustained from the sinking of the boats.

An attack which was made upon an American post at Hampton was more successful. This post, defended by a considerable corps, and commanding the communication between the upper part of the country and Norfolk, was thought by the admiral a proper object for an attempt. Accordingly, on the night of the 25th, the troops, under the command of Sir S. Beckwith, were embarked on-board the light squadron commanded by Rear-admiral Cockburn, which were landed at daylight the following day, to the westward of Hampton. Whilst the enemy's attention was engaged by a fire from the armed vessels upon the batteries, the troops unobserved gained their flanks, and the action which ensued terminated in obtaining possession of their camp and batteries. Some loss was sustained by the British, but that of the Americans was very considerable.

Admiral Cockburn having received directions from Sir J. B. Warren, to put an end to the commerce carried on by the Americans from the port of Ocracoke, in North Carolina, by means of inland navigation, and to destroy any vessels which might be in that harbour, anchored off the bar on the 11th of July, with a light squadron, having on-board detachments of troops under Lieutenant-colonel Napier, and proceeded to put the design into execution. Three divisions of boats and small vessels, with seamen and soldiers, being equipped, were sent into the harbour on the morning of the 12th, when a fire was opened upon them by two armed vessels, one of eighteen guns and the other a schooner. They were, however, soon silenced and taken possession of by the first division of boats; and the troops landing upon the islands of Portsmouth and Ocracoke, became masters of them without opposition, and thus command was obtained of the channel between them and the coast, through which the inland navigation was conducted. By this mode of warfare, the coasts and inlets of this part of America were kept in continual alarm by the motions and enterprises of the blockading squadrons.

The time had now arrived, when the British navy was to recover a large share of its accustomed honors from that foe against whom its glory had suffered a temporary eclipse. Captain Broke, of his majesty's ship Shannon, who was stationed off Boston, had been singularly assiduous in exercising his men at small arms, and bringing them into a state of the most perfect discipline. In that harbour lay the United States frigate Chesapeake, Captain Lawrence, who had been promoted for the gallantry he had displayed in the action with the Peacock. Captain Broke had long been watching for this vessel, desirous only of contending with it on fair terms; and that the enemy might not be prevented from coming out by the apprehension of having more than one antagonist to deal with, on the 1st of June he stood close in with Boston light-house, presenting himself as a challenger to single combat. This being accepted by Captain Lawrence, the Chesapeake sailed out of the harbour, and a severe but short action ensued, for the particulars of which we cannot do better than refer the reader to the dispatch of Captain Broke.—It was fought in view of an immense concourse of people on shore.

“Shannon, Halifax, June 6, 1813.

“Sir,—I have the honor to inform you, that being close in with Boston light-house, in his majesty's ship under my command, on the 1st instant, I had the pleasure of seeing that the United States frigate Chesapeake (whom we had long been watching) was coming out of the harbour to engage the Shannon; I took a position between Cape Ann and Cape Cod, and then hove-to for him to join us; the enemy came down in a very handsome manner, having three American ensigns flying; when closing with us, he sent down his royal yards. I kept the Shannon's up, expecting the breeze would die away. At half-past five, p. m. the enemy hauled up within hail of us on the starboard-side, and the battle began, both ships steering full under the topsails; after exchanging between two and three broadsides, the enemy's ship fell on-board of us, her mizen-channels locking in with our fore-rigging. I went forward to ascertain her position, and observing that the enemy were flinching from their guns, I gave orders to prepare for boarding. Our gallant bands appointed to that service immediately rushed in, under their respective officers, upon the enemy's decks, driving every thing before them with irresistible fury. The enemy made a desperate but disorderly resistance. The firing continued at all the gangways and between the tops, but in two minutes' time the enemy were driven, sword in hand, from every post. The American flag was hauled down, and the proud old British union floated triumphant over it. In another minute they ceased firing from below, and called for quarter. The whole of this service was achieved in fifteen minutes from the commencement of the action.

“I have to lament the loss of many of my gallant shipmates, but they fell exulting in their conquest.

“My brave first lieutenant, Mr. Watt, was slain in the moment of victory, in the act of hoisting the British colours; his death is a severe loss to the service. Mr. Aldham, the purser, who had spi-

BOOK XI.

CHAP. X.

1813.

ritely volunteered the charge of a party of small-arm men, was killed at his post on the gangway. My faithful old clerk, Mr. Dunn, was shot by his side. Mr. Aldham has left a widow to lament his loss. I request the commander-in-chief will recommend her to the protection of the lords-commissioners of the admiralty. My veteran boat-swain, Mr. Stephens, has lost an arm. He fought under Lord Rodney on the 12th of April. I trust his age and services will be duly rewarded.

"I am happy to say, that Mr. Samwell, a midshipman, of much merit, is the only officer wounded besides myself, and he not dangerously. Of my gallant seamen and marines we had twenty-three slain and fifty-six wounded. I subjoin the names of the former. No expressions I can make use of can do justice to the merits of my valiant officers and crew; the calm courage they displayed during the cannonade, and the tremendous precision of their fire, could only be equalled by the ardour with which they rushed to the assault. I recommend them all warmly to the protection of the commander-in-chief. Having received a severe sabre-wound at the first onset, whilst charging a part of the enemy who had rallied on their fore-castle, I was only capable of giving command, till assured our conquest was complete, and then directing second Lieutenant Wallis to take charge of the Shannon, and secure the prisoners, I left the third lieutenant, Mr. Falkiner, (who had headed the main-deck boarders) in charge of the prize. I beg to recommend these officers most strongly to the commander-in-chief's patronage, for the gallantry they displayed during the action, and the skill and judgment they evinced in the anxious duties which afterwards devolved upon them.

"To Mr. Etough, the acting-master, I am much indebted, for the steadiness in which he conn'd the ship into action. The Lieutenants Johns and Law, of the marines, bravely boarded at the head of their respective divisions. It is impossible to particularize every brilliant deed performed by my officers and men; but I must mention, when the ships' yard-arms were locked together, that Mr. Cosnahau, who commanded in our main-top, finding himself screened from the enemy by the feet of the topsail, laid out at the main-yard-arm to fire upon them, and shot three men in that situation. Mr. Smith, who commanded in our fore-top, stormed the enemy's fore-top from the fore-yard-arm, and destroyed all the Americans remaining in it. I particularly beg leave to recommend Mr. Etough, the acting-master, and Messrs. Smith, Leake, Clavering, Raymond, and Littlejohn, midshipmen. This latter officer is the son of Captain Littlejohn, who was slain in the Berwick. The loss of the enemy was about seventy killed and 100 wounded. Among the former were the four lieutenants, a lieutenant of marines, the master, and many other officers. Captain Lawrence is since dead of his wounds.

"The enemy came into action with a complement of 440 men; the Shannon having picked up some recaptured seamen, had three hundred and thirty. The Chesapeake is a fine frigate, and mounts forty-nine guns, eighteens on her main-deck, two-and-thirties on her quarter-deck and fore-castle. Both ships came out of action in the most beautiful order, their rigging appearing as perfect as if they had only been exchanging a salute.

"I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) "P. B. V. BROKE.

"To Captain, the Hon. T. Bladen Capel, &c. Halifax."

Captain Lawrence was honorably interred at Halifax. The humiliated feelings of the numerous spectators on shore, who, instead of a new triumph, saw their gallant ship in so short a time led captive, may easily be conceived. It is said, that Captain Lawrence was so confident of returning victorious into port, that he had neglected to provide accommodations on-board for the wounded, which was the cause of much subsequent distress.

The following message from the president of the United States was received by congress on the 25th of May.

"Fellow citizens of the senate, and of the house of representatives,—At an early day after the close of the last session of congress, an offer was formally communicated from the Emperor of Russia, of his mediation as the common friend of the United States and Great Britain, for the purpose of facilitating a peace between them. The high character of the Emperor Alexander being a satisfactory pledge for the sincerity and impartiality of his offer, it was immediately accepted; and as a further proof of the disposition, on the part of the United States, to meet their adversary in honorable experiments for terminating the war, it was determined to avoid intermediate delay, incident to the distance of the parties, by a definitive provision for the contemplated negotiation. Three of our eminent citizens were accordingly commissioned with the requisite powers, to conclude a treaty of peace with persons clothed with like powers on the part of Great Britain. They were authorized also to enter into such conventional regulations of the commerce between the two countries as may be mutually advantageous. The two envoys who were in the United States at the time of their appointment, have proceeded to join their colleague already at St. Petersburg.

"The envoys have received another commission, authorizing them to conclude with Russia a treaty of commerce, with a view to strengthen the amicable relations, and improve the beneficial intercourse between the two countries.

"The issue of this friendly intercourse of the Russian emperor, and this pacific manifestation on the part of the United States, time only can decide. That the sentiments of Great Britain towards that sovereign will have produced an acceptance of his offered mediation, must be presumed. That no adequate motives exist to prefer a continuance of war with the United States, to the terms on which they are willing to close it, is certain.

"The British cabinet also must be sensible, that, with respect to the important question of impressment, on which the war so essentially turns, a search for or seizure of British persons or property on-board neutral vessels in the high seas, is not a belligerent right derived from the law of nations; and it is obvious, that no visit or search, or use of force for any purpose, on-board the vessel of one independent power on the high seas, can, in war or peace, be sanctioned by the laws or authority of another power. It is equally obvious, that for the purpose of preserving to each state its sea-faring members, by excluding them from the vessels of the other, the mode heretofore proposed by the United States, and now enacted by them as an article of municipal policy, cannot, for a moment, be compared with the mode practised by Great Britain, without a conviction of its title to preference; inasmuch as the latter leaves the discrimination between the mariners of the two nations to officers exposed to unavoidable bias, as well as by a defect of evidence, to a wrong decision, under circumstances precluding, for the most part, the enforcement of controlling penalties, and where a strong decision, besides the irreparable violation of the sacred rights of persons, might frustrate the plans and profits of entire voyages; whereas the mode assumed by the United States guards, with studied fairness and efficacy, against errors in such cases, and avoids the effect of casual errors, or the safety of navigation, and the success of mercantile expeditions.

"If the reasonableness of expectations, drawn from these considerations, could guarantee their fulfilment, a just peace would not be distant. But it becomes the wisdom of the national legislature to keep in mind the true policy, or rather the indispensable obligation, of adapting its measures to the supposition, that the only course to that happy event is in the vigorous employment of the resources of war: and painful as the reflection is, this duty is particularly enforced by the spirit and manner in which the war continues to be waged by the enemy, who, uninfluenced by the unvaried examples of humanity set them, are adding to the savage fury of it on one frontier a system of plunder and conflagration on the other, equally forbidden by respect for national character, and the established rule of civilized warfare.

"As an encouragement to persevering and invigorating exertions to bring the contest to a happy result, I have the satisfaction of being able to appeal to the auspicious progress of our own arms, both by land and on the water.

"In continuation of the brilliant achievements of our infant navy, a signal triumph has been gained by Captain Lawrence and his companions in the Hornetsloop of war, which destroyed a British sloop of war with a celerity so unexampled, and with a slaughter of the enemy so disproportionate to the loss in the Hornet, as to claim for the conquerors the highest praise, and the full recompence provided by congress in preceding cases. Our public ships of war in general, as well as the private armed vessels, have continued also their activity and success against the commerce of the enemy, and by their vigilance and address have greatly frustrated the efforts of the hostile squadrons distributed along our coasts, to intercept them in returning into port, and resuming their cruises. The augmentation of our naval force, as authorized at the last session of congress, is in progress. On the lakes our superiority is near at hand, where it is not already established.

"The events of the campaign, so far as they are known to us, furnish matter of congratulation, and show, that under a wise organization and efficient direction, the army is destined to a glory not less brilliant than that which already encircles the navy. The attack and capture of York is, in that quarter, a presage of future and greater victories, —while on the western frontiers, the issue of the late siege of Fort Meigs leaves nothing to regret but a single act of inconsiderate valor.

"The sudden death of the distinguished citizen who represented the United States in France, without any special arrangements by him for such a contingency, has left us without the expected sequel to his last communications; nor has the French government taken any measures for bringing the depending negotiations to a conclusion through its representative in the United States. This failure adds to delays before so unusually spun out. A successor to our departed minister has been appointed, and is ready to proceed on his mission. The course which he will pursue in fulfilling it, is that prescribed by a steady regard to the true interests of the United States, which equally avoids an abandonment of their just demands, and a connection of their features with the system of other powers.

"The receipts into the treasury from the 1st of October to the 31st of March last, including the sums received on account of treasury-notes, and of the loans authorised by the acts of the last and the preceding session of congress, have amounted to 15,412,000 dollars. The expenditures during the same period amounted to 15,920,000, and left in the treasury, on the 1st of April, 1,857,000 dollars. The loan of 16,000,000 of dollars, authorised by the act of the 8th of February last, has been contracted for. Of that sum more than a million

BOOK XI.

CHAP. X.

1813.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. X.

1813.

of dollars had been paid into the treasury prior to the 1st of April, and formed a part of the receipts as above stated. The remainder of that loan, amounting to near 15,000,000 of dollars, with the sum of 5,000,000 of dollars authorised to be issued in treasury-notes, and the estimated receipts from the customs, and the sales of public lands, amounting to 9,000,000 dollars, and making in the whole 29,300,000 dollars, to be received during the last nine months of the present year, will be necessary to meet the expenditures already authorised, and the engagements contracted in relation to the public debt. These engagements amount, during that period, to 10,500,000 dollars, which, with near one million for the civil, miscellaneous, and diplomatic expenses, both foreign and domestic, and 17,800,000 for the military and naval expenditures, including the ships of war building, and to be built, will leave a sum in the treasury at the end of the present year equal to that of the 1st of April last. A part of this sum may be considered as a resource for defraying any extraordinary expenses already authorised by law beyond the sum above-mentioned; and a further resource for any emergency may be found in the sum of 1,000,000 of dollars, the loan of which to the United States has been authorised by the state of Pennsylvania, but which has not yet been brought into effect.

"This view of our finances, whilst it shews that due provision has been made for the expenses of the current year, shews, at the same time, by the limited amount of the actual revenue, and the dependence on loans, the necessity of providing more adequately for the future supplies of the treasury. This can best be done by a well-digested system of internal revenue, in aid of existing sources; which will have the effect both of abridging the amount of necessary loans, and on that account, as well as by placing the public credit on a more satisfactory basis, of improving the terms on which loans may be obtained.

"The loan of 16,000,000 was not contracted for at a less interest than about seven and a half per cent.; and although other causes may have had an agency, it cannot be doubted, that with the advantage of a more extended and less precarious revenue, a lower rate of interest might have sufficed. A longer postponement of the advantage could not fail to have a still greater influence on future loans.

"In recommending to the national legislature this resort to additional taxes, I feel great satisfaction in the assurance, that our constituents, who have already displayed so much zeal and firmness in the cause of their country, will cheerfully give other proofs of their patriotism which it calls for. Happily no people, with local and territorial exceptions never to be wholly avoided, are more able than the people of the United States to spare for the public wants a portion of their private means, whether regard be had to the ordinary profits of industry, or the ordinary price of subsistence in our country, compared with those in any other. And in no case could stronger reasons be felt for the yielding the requisite contributions.

"By rendering the public resources certain, and commensurate to the public exigencies, the constituted authorities will be able to prosecute the war more rapidly to its proper issue: every hostile hope founded on a calculated failure of our resources will be cut off; and by adding to the evidence of bravery and skill, in combats on the ocean and on the land, and an alacrity in supplying the treasury, necessary to give them their fullest effect, and thus demonstrating to the world the public energy which our political institutions combine, with the personal liberty distinguishing them, the best security will be provided against future enterprises on the rights, or the peace of the nation.

"The contest in which the United States are engaged appeals for its support to every motive that can animate an uncorrupted and enlightened people,—to the love of country,—to the pride of liberty,—to the glorious founders of their independence,—by a successful vindication of its violated attributes; to the gratitude and sympathy which demands security from the most degrading wrongs of a class of citizens who have proved so worthy of the protection of their country by their heroic zeal in its defence; and, finally, to the sacred obligations of transmitting, entire, to future generations, that precious patrimony of national rights and independence, which is held in trust by the present from the goodness of Divine Providence.

"Being aware of the inconveniences to which a protracted session, at this season, would be liable, I limit the present communication to objects of primary importance. In special messages which may ensue, regard will be had to the same consideration.

"JAMES MADISON."

"Washington, May 25, 1813."

CHAPTER XI.

Attack on Black Rock.—Torpedoes and exploding Machines employed by the Americans.—Destruction of the Arsenal, &c. at Plattsburg.—York plundered by the Americans.—Success of Sir James Yeo on Lake Ontario.—Failure of Attack on Sanduski.—Reconnoissance on Fort George.—Conclusion of the Session of Congress.—Defeat of the British Squadron on Lake Erie.—Defeat of General Proctor.—Actions on Lake Ontario.—Invasion of Lower Canada by the Americans repulsed.—Defeat of General Boyd.—The Town of Newark burnt by the Americans.—Capture of Fort Niagara by the British.—Defeat of the Americans under General Hull.—Buffalo, &c. burnt.—Sir George Prevost's Proclamation.—Conclusion of the Campaign.—Observations.—Meeting of Congress.—Message of the President.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL Bishopp, with a detachment of troops from the centre division of the British army in Upper Canada, embarked early on the morning of the 11th of July, for the purpose of destroying the American naval establishment at Black Rock on Lake Ontario. The detachment landed, unperceived, before daylight, and immediately proceeded to attack the batteries, which they carried with little opposition, the enemy retreating with precipitation. They then set fire to the block-houses, barracks, and navy-yard, with a large schooner; and the stores which could be got off were carried across the river. Before they could be taken away, however, the Americans, reinforced by a body of Indians, advanced, and rendered it expedient for the troops to retreat to their boats; and they recrossed the river under a heavy fire, which occasioned a considerable loss, the commander himself being severely wounded. The object of the expedition, however, was, in a great measure, accomplished.

On the 20th of July, the president was induced to issue a strict injunction on all naval officers to exercise the utmost vigilance in stopping and detaining all vessels and craft proceeding, or apparently about to proceed, towards the blockading ships; it being ascertained, that such intercourse had been carried on to a great extent, both by natives and foreigners, thereby conveying provisions and intelligence to the British. Attempts were also publicly encouraged for the destruction of the British men-of-war upon the coasts of America by torpedoes and other explosive machinery. One of the concealed methods of doing mischief, by the Americans, merits unqualified reprobation, from its truly insidious character. A schooner was fitted out from New York, laden with provisions and stores, under which were deposited several casks of gunpowder, with trains communicating with a piece of clock-work contrived to go off at a certain time. The vessel was thrown in the way of the Ramilies, which sent a boat to take possession of her, when she was deserted by her crew, and brought near the man-of-war. Fortunately the captain, Sir Thomas Hardy, directed, that she should be placed alongside of a captured sloop, and not of the Ramilies. A dreadful explosion soon took place, which proved fatal to the second lieutenant and ten seamen, who were on-board: had she been close to the Ramilies, the loss would have been much greater.

In Upper Canada the American forces still occupied the position of Fort George and its immediate vicinity, where they were straitened by the advance of the British commander, Major-general De Rottenburg, to St. David's, within seven miles of the fort. The enemy's fleet, consisting of two ships, one brig, and eleven schooners, had sailed from Sackett's harbour some days before, and the British squadron had gone in search of it. With a view of calling off the attention of the Americans from this province to the defence of their own settlements, Sir George Prevost sent out an expedition of gun-boats and other vessels, with 800 picked men, to make a movement on Lake Champlain, which was attended with the most complete success. The land-forces, under Lieutenant-colonel Murray, proceeded to Plattsburg, where they destroyed the enemy's arsenal, block-house, commissary's buildings, and stores, together with the extensive barracks of Saranac, capable of containing 4,000 troops. A quantity of naval stores was brought off, particularly equipments for a large number of batteaux. The barracks and stores at Swanton were also destroyed. A detachment, sent to destroy the public building and stores at Champlain Town effected their purpose without opposition. The militia, assembled for the defence of Plattsburg, disbanded on the appearance of the armament. The naval part of the expedition captured and destroyed four vessels, without any attempt from the enemy's armed vessels to rescue them. At this time, the American general, Hampton, had concentrated his forces, which consisted of about 4,500 regulars, and a large body of militia, at Burlington.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. XI.

1813.

On the 31st of July, the American fleet on Lake Ontario appeared off the town of York; and making a landing under Commodore Chauncey, entered the place, liberated the prisoners in the gaol, and plundered the contents of some private stores, all public property having been previously removed. They landed again on the following day, burnt the small barrack, wood-yard, and store-house, and afterwards sailed away, having done very little damage except to individuals. The town was totally defenceless, the principal persons having left it, and the militia being still under parole.

During the month of August, Sir James Yeo made frequent attempts to bring the American squadron on Lake Ontario to action, but was frustrated by light and baffling winds, and the enemy's superiority in sailing. On the night of the 11th, however, he was able to get so close to them, that it was necessary for them either to engage, or to sacrifice two of their schooners. They preferred the latter; and after firing a few shots, Sir James took possession of two fine armed schooners, with a crew of forty men each. The Americans lost two others of their largest schooners by oversetting in carrying too much sail when chased by the British squadron, and about 100 men perished with them.

Major-general Proctor, in compliance with the importunity of his Indian allies, made an advance with about 350 of the 41st regiment, and 3 or 4,000 Indians; and, on the 2d of August, attempted to carry by assault the fort of Sandusky, near the head of Lake Erie, where the Americans had concentrated a considerable force. The Indians, however, keeping out of reach of the enemy's fire, the few British were left to make the attack by themselves, in which they displayed great bravery; but the fire from the defenders became so galling and destructive, that the general found it most prudent to order a retreat, which was effected with the loss of twenty-five killed, as many missing, and about forty wounded.

About the middle of August, Sir George Prevost removed his head-quarters to St. David's, on the Niagara frontier, where he found 2,000 British soldiers, on an extended line, cooping up in Fort George an American force exceeding 4,000 men. Feeling desirous of ascertaining, in person, the extent of the enemy's works, and of viewing the means he possessed for defending the position he occupied, Sir George Prevost ordered a general demonstration to be made on Fort George, to commence by the attack and surprise of all the American picquets thrown out in its front. This service was executed in a most brilliant manner; the picquets were driven in, a great part of them being taken, with a very trifling loss; and the British general found himself close to the fort and the new-entrenched camp, which was formed on the right of that work, both of them crowded with men, bristled with cannon, and supported by the fire from Fort Niagara, on the opposite side of the river; but no provocation could induce the American army to leave their places of shelter, and venture into the field. Having made a display of his forces in vain, Sir George Prevost retired without any loss.

Congress closed its session in August, after conducting its business with unaccustomed dispatch. The principal business of the meeting was the establishment of a system of war-taxes capable of defraying the interest of the existing debt and of future loans; and though there was considerable differences of opinion as to the fittest objects of taxation, the majority gave their support to the measures proposed by the committee of ways and means. The duties imposed were, on licences to retailers of wine, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandize; on licences to distillers of spirituous liquors; on sales by auction of merchandize, and ships and vessels; on sugar refined in the United States; on bank-notes and certain negotiable paper; and on imported salt: these to continue in force during the present war and a year after its termination. A further loan was authorized of 7,500,000 dollars for the service of the present year and the first quarter of the next. A variety of acts were also passed relative to the prosecution and conduct of the war, and the provision for widows and orphans; and greater encouragement was given to privateers in respect to prizes. An act also passed, conformably to the president's former recommendation, prohibiting the use of British commercial licences.

In September, the great object of the Americans, that of gaining possession of the lakes, was fully accomplished with respect to Lake Erie. Commodore Perry, their commander on that station, states, in his dispatch, that on the 10th he discovered the hostile squadron from his anchorage at Putin Bay, and getting under weigh, they came to action a little before twelve. His vessel, the Laurence, was so much injured by the fire of his opponent, that it became unmanageable; and after an engagement of two hours, the greatest part of her crew being killed or wounded, he quitted her, and went on-board the Niagara. Soon after, he saw the Laurence's colours struck, but the foe not being able to take possession of her, they were again hoisted. The Niagara then passed through the adverse line, consisting of two ships, a brig, a large schooner, and a sloop; and being assisted by his small vessels, which were got into close action, the whole of them were compelled to surrender. Most of the officers of the British, or rather Canadian squadron, (for it is said to have been wholly equipped and chiefly manned by the inhabitants of Canada) were killed or wounded, as well as a great number of the crews. The remainder were landed as prisoners at Sandusky. The relation of this affair afterwards given by the British commander, Captain Barclay, does not materially differ from the preceding. He says, he was reduced to the necessity of sailing, wretchedly manned as he was, to fight the enemy, who blockaded the ports, on account of his urgent want of provisions and stores. His ship, the Detroit, being, after a severe engagement, rendered almost a wreck, himself wounded, and his first lieutenant mortally so, his consort, the Queen Charlotte, whose captain, Finnis, was killed, having struck, he was compelled to submit to the same fate. He represents the American squadron as greatly superior in strength; and says, that there were not more than fifty British seamen on-board his own vessels. He returns the loss in the action at three officers and thirty-eight men killed; nine officers and eighty-five men wounded.

The consequence of this disaster to the British was the relinquishment of the Michigan territory, excepting Michilimackinac, and the abandonment of the posts in Upper Canada beyond the Grand River.

General Proctor, on the 24th of September commenced his retreat from Sandwich, having previously dismantled the posts of Amherstburg and Detroit, and destroyed the public buildings and stores of every kind. On the 5th of October, when within a few miles of a strong position which he purposed to take at the Moravian village on the Thames, he was attacked by General Harrison, with a force so much superior that resistance was vain, and his small army, consisting of not more than 450 regular troops, was obliged to disperse. Of these he afterwards collected about 200, with whom he at length reached Burlington Heights, the head-quarters of Major-general Vincent.

In the American account of this action, the prisoners taken are said to amount to 601 regulars, including officers. Eight pieces of artillery were also captured.

Sir George Prevost having received information, that the Americans were assembling a force on the Montreal frontier, thought it expedient to quit Kingston and repair to Montreal, where he arrived on the 25th of September. He found that the American Major-general Hampton, after advancing to the frontier-line, and overpowering one of the British picquets, had suddenly moved to the westward.

Measures had been, in the mean time, taken by Major-general Sir R. Sheaffe, the British commander of the district, to resist the advance of the enemy, by moving the whole of the troops under his command nearer the frontier-line, and by calling out about 3,000 of the sedentary militia. Sir G. Prevost thought it necessary to increase this latter force to nearly 8,000, by embodying the whole of the sedentary militia upon the frontier, this being in addition to the six battalions of incorporated militia, amounting to 5,000 men: "It is with peculiar satisfaction," says Sir George Prevost, in his dispatch to Earl Bathurst, "I have to report to your lordship, that his majesty's Canadian subjects have, a second time, answered the call to arm in defence of their country, with a zeal and alacrity beyond all praise, and which manifests, in the strongest manner, their loyalty to their sovereign, and their cheerful obedience to his commands."

The force now assembled, by the Americans, at different points, for the purpose of invading the two Canadas, was greater than at any other period during the war. Major-general Harrison had under him at Sandusky, on the frontier of the Michigan territory, about 8,000 men, ready to avail himself of the absolute command lately obtained by their navy on Lake Erie, to advance upon Detroit and Amherstburg. Major-general Wilkinson commanded at Fort George and Niagara, with a force amounting to nearly 6,500 men; and Major-general Hampton, with a force under his command, which, by the last accounts, had been considerably increased, amounted to about 8,000 men. The whole of this force, amounting to 26,000 men, consisted of regular troops, exclusive of 10,000 militia.

In consequence of Sir George Prevost's solicitation to Admiral Sir J. Warren, for a supply of seamen for the lake service, he received the crews of two sloops of war, part of whom he sent to join Captain Pring at Isle au Noix, for the service of Lake Champlain, and the remainder proceeded to Lake Ontario.

On Lake Ontario the opposite commanders, Sir James Yeo and Commodore Chauncey, appeared eager for an opportunity to bring each other to fair combat. On the 11th of September, there was a probability of a general engagement, the American fleet having, with the wind in their favor, got near enough to the British to do some mischief with their long guns, the fire of which could not be adequately returned. The fleets, however, parted without coming to close action. On the 28th, the fleets had a running fight, in which the Pike, the American commander's ship, lost her main-top-mast; but a heavy gale separated the combatants. Little loss was incurred on either side in these affairs; but, on the 5th of October, the British suffered a severe disaster. Six sail of transports, with troops on-board, proceeding without convoy from York for Kingston, were intercepted and captured by the American fleet. The prisoners taken, of all descriptions, amounted to 264, a number which, at this period, could be ill-spared.

The American general, Hampton, who had taken his post on the Chateauguay river, near a settlement called the Four Corners, crossed the boundary line into Lower Canada, with the army under his command, on the 21st of October, surprised a small party of Indians, and drove in a picquet of militia; and having made a road for bringing up his artillery, proceeded against the British advanced-posts. On the 26th, his cavalry and light-troops were discovered advancing on both banks of the Chateauguay, by a detachment covering a working party of habitans employed in felling timber, for the purpose of constructing abbatiss. Lieutenant-colonel de Salaberry, who had the command of the advanced picquets, composed of the light-infantry company of the Canadian fencibles, and two companies of voltigeurs, on the north-side of the river, made so excellent a disposition of his little band, that he checked the advance of the enemy's principal column, led by Major-general Hampton in person, and accompanied by Brigadier-general Izard; whilst the American light-brigade, under Colonel McCarty, was, in like manner, repulsed in its progress on the south-side of the river, by the spirited advance of the right flank-company of the third battalion of the embodied militia, under Captain Daly, supported by Captain Bruyer's company of Chateauguay chasseurs. Captains Daly and Bruyer being both wounded, and their companies having sustained some loss, their position was immediately taken up by a flank-company of the first battalion of embodied militia; the enemy rallied, and repeatedly returned to the attack, which terminated only with the day, in his complete disgrace and defeat; being foiled, at all points, by a handful of men, who, by their determined bravery maintained their position, and screened from insult the working parties, who continued their labours unconcerned.

Sir George Prevost, who arrived soon after the commencement of the action, bestowed the highest praises on the conduct of the defenders, of whom the force actually engaged did not exceed 300. The prisoners stated, that the American army amounted to 7,000 infantry and 200 cavalry, with ten pieces of artillery. The loss of the British was trifling. That of the Americans was severe, and was partly incurred from parties of their own firing upon each other in the woods. Hampton's army afterwards entirely quitted Lower Canada, and retreated to its former encampments at the Four Corners.

In co-operation with this invasion, General Wilkinson, on the 30th of October, left Grenadier

Island, on Lake Ontario, with 10,000 men in small craft and batteaux, and proceeded down the St. Lawrence with the avowed intention of taking up his winter-quarters at Montreal. Having, on the 31st, halted a few miles below Gravelly Point, on the south-side of the river, his position was, on the following day, reconnoitred, and afterwards cannonaded by a division of gun-boats, under the command of Captain Mulcaster, of the royal navy. By keeping close to his own shore, the enemy arrived, on the 6th instant, within six miles of the port of Prescott, which he endeavoured to pass, unobserved, during the night of the 7th; but the vigilance of Lieutenant-colonel Pearson, who commanded there, frustrated his attempt, and the American armada was obliged to sustain a heavy and destructive cannonade during the whole of that operation.

Sir George Prevost having anticipated the probability of such a movement, had ordered a corps of observation, under the command of Lieutenant-colonel Morrison, amounting to 800 rank and file, to follow and watch the motions of the Americans. Upon this corps an attack was made by Brigadier-general Boyd, with 3 or 4,000 men, on the 11th of November. Upon the approach of the Americans, about two o'clock in the afternoon, the advance of the British troops gradually fell back upon the main body, which occupied a strong position; the right resting on the river, and the left on a pine-wood, exhibiting a front of about 700 yards. The ground being open, Colonel Morrison's disposed his troops in the following manner: the flank-companies of the 49th regiment, the detachment of the Canadian fencibles, with one field-piece, under Lieutenant-colonel Pearson, on the right, a little advanced on the road; three companies of the 89th regiment, under Captain Barnes, with a gun, formed in echelon, with the advance on its left supporting it. The 49th and 89th, thrown more to the rear, with a gun, formed the main body and reserve extending to the woods on the left, which were occupied by the voltigeurs, under Major Herriot, and the Indians under Lieutenant Anderson. At about half-past two the action became general, when the enemy endeavoured, by moving forward a brigade from his right, to turn the left of the British, but was repulsed by the 89th, forming in potence with the 49th, and both corps moving forward, occasionally firing by platoons. The efforts were next directed against the enemy's right; and to repulse this movement, the 49th took ground in that direction in echelon, followed by the 89th; when within half musket-shot the line was formed, under a heavy but irregular fire from the enemy.

The 49th was then directed to charge the gun posted opposite to one of the British; but it became necessary, ~~when~~ within a short distance of it, to check the forward movement, in consequence of a charge from their cavalry on the right, lest they should wheel about, and fall upon their rear; but they were received in so gallant a manner by the companies of the 89th, under Captain Barnes, and the well-directed fire of the artillery, that they quickly retreated, and by an immediate charge from those companies one gun was gained.

The Americans immediately concentrated their force to check the advance of the British, but such was the steady countenance and well-directed fire of the troops and artillery, that about half-past four they gave way at all points from an exceeding strong position, endeavouring, by their light-infantry, to cover their retreat, who were soon driven away by a judicious movement made by Lieutenant-colonel Pearson.

The loss of the Americans in this action was estimated at 800 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners; that of the British was about 180.

The final result of this combined attempt of the Americans was, that both provinces of Canada were freed from the invaders, who retired to winter-quarters in their own territory. In the meantime, a division of British gun-boats, on Lake Champlain, had burnt a dépôt-magazine near Plattsburg.

The manner in which the war had been conducted by the Americans against Canada seemed to prove, that there was great incapacity, not merely in the generals who commanded, but also in those branches of the executive which had planned the expeditions and appointed the generals. For these and other reasons, therefore, Mr. Madison proposed, that the Emperor of Russia should mediate between Great Britain and America. But this proposal was decidedly objected to by the British government; though at the same time they professed, as they had always done, an anxious desire to put an end to the war.

A detachment of troops, sent by the commander-in-chief, under Colonel Murray, for the purpose of restraining the depredations of a party of banditti organized by the American government, upon the inhabitants of the Niagara district, arrived at Fort George on the 12th of December, from which the enemy had made a hasty retreat across the river, burning the town of Newark as they fled.

Colonel Murray afterwards proceeded against Fort Niagara. He embarked his troops, about 500 in number, on the night of the 18th of December; and on the following morning he landed three miles from the fort, provided with means for a scalade. He then advanced against the fortress, which was carried in the most gallant manner, after a short but spirited resistance. The loss of the British, in this affair, was very trifling; but that of the Americans was estimated at 430 officers and men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, the whole belonging to the artillery and line. The ordnance taken was twenty-seven pieces of cannon, and about 3,000 stand of arms, and store-houses full of clothing and camp-equipage were the further prize of the victors.

The American general, Hull, after this affair, arrived at the town of Buffalo, and collecting all the troops in the vicinity, amounting to more than 2,000 men, took post at Black-rock, to check the further advance of the British. He was not, however, long suffered to remain there unmolested. Major-general Riall, assembling a force of about 950 regulars and 50 militia, with 400 Indians, crossed the Niagara river on the night of the 29th of December; and at day-break on the 30th, moved on to attack the enemy, who was strongly posted. After a vigorous resistance, the impetuosity of the assailants forced the Americans to give way, and they were driven through their batteries to the town of Buffalo, about two miles distant. There a further resistance was made; but, in a short time, the American troops fled in all directions, and took to the woods, leaving behind them three pieces of cannon. Their loss was not known, but 130 prisoners was made; the rapidity of their flight preventing a larger capture. The loss of the British in this spirited action, amounted to 112 in killed, wounded, and missing. Among the wounded, was Lieutenant-colonel Ogilvy, as he was gallantly leading the attack.

After the engagement, an officer was sent with a detachment to destroy two schooners and a sloop, part of the enemy's lake squadron that were on-shore below the town of Buffalo, which service was effectually performed. The town itself, the inhabitants having quitted it, was then committed to the flames, with the whole of the public stores, and the village of Black-rock was likewise burnt. A force was then directed to move down the river to Fort Niagara to destroy all the remaining cover of the enemy upon this frontier, which being effected, the whole frontier was left clear and naked.

An expedition was sent against the enemy's posts and depôts at Derby, in the state of Vermont, which were taken possession of at day-break on the 17th of December. An extensive barrack, for 1,200 men, which had been but lately erected, was destroyed, together with the stables and store-houses, and a considerable quantity of military stores were brought away.

From several causes, it was not to be expected that the war between Great Britain and America would be carried on in the most humane and honorable mode, especially by the Americans: they had not yet forgotten the war of the revolution; and our employment of the Indians, though they set us the example, exasperated them still more:

BOOK XI.

CHAP. XI.

1813.

the consequences were such as might naturally be dreaded. In their different invasions of Canada, the greatest inhumanities were exercised; especially at Sandwich, at the settlements on the Thames, at York, and at Fort George. Finding that remonstrances against this mode of conducting the war produced no effect, Sir George Prevost issued the following proclamation to the inhabitants of Canada, announcing a severe retaliation:—

“The complete success which has attended his majesty’s arms on the Niagara frontier, having placed in our possession the whole of the enemy’s posts on that line, it became a matter of imperious duty to retaliate on America the miseries which the unfortunate inhabitants of Newark had been made to suffer upon the evacuation of Fort George.

“The villages of Lewiston, Black-rock, and Buffalo, have accordingly been burned.

“At the same time that his excellency, the commander of the forces, sincerely deprecates this mode of warfare, he trusts that it will be sufficient to call the attention of every candid and impartial person, both amongst ourselves and the enemy, to the circumstances from which it has arisen, to satisfy them that this departure from the established usages of war has originated with America herself, and that to her alone are justly chargeable all the awful and unhappy consequences which have hitherto flowed, and are likely to result from it.

“It is not necessary to advert to the conduct of the troops employed on the American coast, in conjunction with his majesty’s squadron, under Admiral Sir John B. Warren, since, as they were neither within the command, nor subject to the controul of his excellency, their acts cannot be ascribable to him, even if they wanted that justification which the circumstances that occasioned them so amply afford.

“It will be sufficient for the present purpose, and in order to mark the character of the war, as carried on upon the frontiers of these provinces, to trace the line of conduct observed by his excellency and the troops under his command, since the commencement of hostilities, and to contrast it with that of his enemy.

“The first invasion of Upper Canada took place in July, 1812, when the American forces, under Brigadier-general Hull, crossed over and took possession of Sandwich, where they began to manifest a disposition so different from that of a magnanimous enemy, and which they have since invariably displayed, in marking out, as objects of their peculiar resentment, the loyal subjects of his majesty, and in dooming their property to plunder and conflagration.

“Various instances of this kind occurred, both at Sandwich and its neighbourhood, at the very period when his majesty’s standard was waving upon the fort of Michilimackinac, and affording protection to the persons and property of those who had submitted to it: within a few weeks afterwards, the British flag was also hoisted on the fortress of Detroit, which, together with the whole of the Michigan territory, had surrendered to his majesty’s arms.

“Had not his excellency been actuated by sentiments far different from those which had influenced the American government, and the persons employed by it, in the wanton acts of destruction of private property, committed during their short occupation of a part of Upper Canada, his excellency could not have failed to have availed himself of the opportunity which the undisturbed possession of the whole of the Michigan territory afforded him of amply retaliating for the devastating system which had been pursued at Sandwich and on the Thames.

“But strictly in conformity to the views and disposition of his own government, and to that liberal and magnanimous policy which it had dictated, he chose rather to forbear an imitation of the enemy’s example, in the hope that such forbearance would be duly appreciated by the government of the United States, and would produce a return to the more civilized usages of war.

“The persons and property, therefore, of the inhabitants of the Michigan territory were respected, and remained unmolested.

“In the winter of the following year, when the success which attended the gallant enterprize against Ogdensburgh had placed that populous and flourishing village in our possession, the generosity of the British character was again conspicuous in the scrupulous preservation of every article which could be considered as private property; such public buildings only being destroyed as were used for the accommodation of troops and for public stores.

“The destruction of the defences of Ogdensburgh, and the dispersion of the enemy’s force in that neighbourhood, laid open the whole of their frontier, on the St. Lawrence, to the incursions of his majesty’s troops; and Hamilton, as well as the numerous settlements on the banks of the river, might, at any hour, had such been the disposition of his majesty’s government, or of those acting under it, been plundered and laid waste.

“During the course of the following summer, by the fortunate result of the enterprize against Plattsburgh, that town was, for several hours, in the complete possession of our troops, there not being any force in the neighbourhood which could attempt a resistance. Yet even there, under circumstances of strong temptation, and when the recent example of the enemy, in the wanton destruction of private property and buildings not used for military purposes, must have been fresh in the recollection of the forces employed on that occasion, and would have justified a retaliation on their part, their forbearance was strongly manifested, and the directions his excellency had given to the commander of that expedition so scrupulously obeyed, that scarcely can another instance be shewn in which, during a state of war, and under similar circumstances, an enemy so completely under the power, and at the mercy of their adversaries, had so little cause of complaint.

"During the course of the same summer, forts Schlosser and Black-rock were surprised and taken by a part of the forces under the command of Major-general de Rottenburgh, on the Niagara frontier, at both of which places personal property was respected, and the public buildings were alone destroyed.

"It was certainly matter of just and reasonable expectation, that the humane and liberal course of conduct pursued by his excellency on these different occasions would have had its due weight with the American government, and would have led it to have abstained, in the further prosecution of the war, from any acts of wantonness or violence, which could only tend, unnecessarily, to add to its ordinary calamities, and to bring down upon their own unoffending citizens, a retaliation, which, though distant, they must have known would await and certainly followed such conduct.

"Undeterred, however, by his excellency's example of moderation, or by any of the consequences to be apprehended from the adoption of such barbarous measures, the American forces at Fort George, acting, as there is every reason to believe, under the orders, or with the approbation of their government, for some time previous to their evacuation of that fortress, under various pretences burned and destroyed the farm-houses and buildings of many of the respectable and peaceable inhabitants of that neighbourhood. But the full measure of this species of barbarity remained to be completed at a season when all its horrors might be more fully and keenly felt by those who were to become the wretched victims of it.

"It will hardly be credited by those who shall hereafter read it in the page of history, that in the enlightened era of the nineteenth century, and in the inclemency of a Canadian winter, the troops of a nation, calling itself civilized and Christian, had wantonly, and without the shadow of a pretext, forced 400 helpless women and children to quit their dwellings, and to be the mournful spectators of the conflagration and total destruction of all that belonged to them.

"Yet such was the fate of Newark on the 10th of December, a day which the inhabitants of Upper Canada can never forget, and the recollection of which cannot but nerve the arms when again opposed to their vindictive. On the night of that day, the American troops, under Brigadier-general M'Clure, being about to evacuate Fort George, which they could no longer retain, by an act of inhumanity disgraceful to themselves and to the nation to which they belong, set fire to upwards of 150 houses, composing the beautiful village of Newark, and burned them to the ground; leaving, without covering or shelter, those 'innocent, unfortunate, and distressed inhabitants,' whom that officer, by his proclamation, had previously engaged to protect.

"His excellency would have ill-consulted the honor of his country, and the justice due to his majesty's injured and insulted subjects, had he permitted an act of such needless cruelty to pass unpunished, or had he failed to visit, whenever the opportunity arrived, upon the inhabitants of the neighbouring American frontier the calamities thus inflicted upon those of our own.

"The opportunity has occurred, and a full measure of retaliation has taken place, such as it is hoped will teach the enemy to respect, in future, the laws of war, and recall him to a sense of what is due to himself as well as to us.

"In the further prosecution of the contest, to which so extraordinary a character has been given, his excellency must be guided by the course of conduct which the enemy shall hereafter pursue. Lamenting, as his excellency does, the necessity imposed upon him of retaliating upon the subjects of America the miseries inflicted on the inhabitants of Newark, it is not his intention to pursue further a system of warfare so revolting to his own feelings, and so little congenial to the British character, unless the future measure of the enemy should compel him again to resort to it.

"To those possessions of the enemy along the whole line of the frontier which have hitherto remained undisturbed, and which are now within his excellency's reach, and at the mercy of the troops under his command, his excellency has determined to extend the same forbearance and the same freedom from rapine and murder which they have hitherto experienced; and from this determination, the future conduct of the American government shall alone induce his excellency to depart.

"The inhabitants of these provinces will, in the mean time, be prepared to resist, with firmness and courage, whatever attempts the resentment of the enemy, arising from their disgrace and their merited sufferings, may lead them to make; well assured that they will be powerfully assisted, at all points, by the troops under his excellency's command, and that prompt and signal vengeance will be taken for every fresh departure, by the enemy, from that system of warfare which ought alone to subsist between enlightened and civilized nations."

It is with regret that we are obliged to conclude our account of the American campaign with the notice of some retaliatory measures, in addition to those mentioned in the above proclamation, which, if they had been persisted in, would have stamped a character on the war highly inconsistent with the supposed improvement of the age in the practice of justice and humanity. The peculiar circumstances under which the United States are placed with respect to emigrants from foreign countries, on whom their population was originally founded; and to whom they are still indebted for large accessions of useful citizens, had made them desirous of introducing a new principle into the code of nations, that of the right of individuals to transfer their allegiance from the country of their birth to that by which they are adopted, and, in consequence, the right of nations to accept and support that transfer. This maxim being contrary to that of all the European governments, it is evident that frequent disputes must arise from putting it in practice, especially in time of war; and Great Britain being the country from which America derives the greatest part of its emigrant population, in every quarrel the two states must be involved in angry contention from this source, until some common rule of decision is agreed upon between them. The actual existence of such a difference, with its lamentable effects, are made known in the general orders issued by the commander of the British forces from Montreal on October the 27th. The facts stated are, that twenty-three soldiers of the infantry of the United States, being made prisoners, were sent to England, and held in close confinement as British subjects; that General Dearborn had been instructed to put into similar confinement twenty-three British soldiers as hostages for the safety of the former; that the prince-regent had given directions to put in close confinement, forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers, to answer for the safety of the last twenty-three soldiers; and also to apprise General Dearborn, that if any of them should suffer death in consequence of executing the law of nations upon the first twenty-three confined as British subjects, double the number of the confined American officers should immediately be selected for retaliation; and, moreover, that the commanders of his majesty's armies and fleets had received orders to prosecute the war with unmitigated severity against all the cities, towns, and villages of the United States, in case their government should persist in their intention of retaliation. In this dreadful state of mutual menace, affairs remained at the close of the year.

The Congress of the United States met at Washington on the 7th of December, when they received the following message from the president, which is a most important and interesting document.

"Fellow-citizens of the senate and of the house of representatives,—In meeting you at the present interesting conjuncture, it would have been highly satisfactory if I could have communicated a favorable result of the mission charged with negotiations for restoring peace. It was a just expectation from the respect due to the distinguished sovereign who had invited them by his offer of mediation,—from the readiness with which the invitation was accepted on the part of the United States,—and from the pledge to be found in an act of their legislature for the liberality which their plenipotentiaries would carry into the negotiations, that no time would be lost by the British government in embracing the experiment for hastening a stop to the effusion of blood. A prompt and cordial acceptance of the mediation on that side was the less to be doubted, as it was of a nature not to submit rights or pretensions on either side to the decision of an umpire, but to afford merely an opportunity, honorable and desirable to both, for discussing, and, if possible, adjusting them for the interest of both.

"The British cabinet, either mistaking our desire of peace for a dread of British power, or misled by other fallacious conclusions, has disappointed this reasonable anticipation. No communication from our envoys having reached us, no information on the subject has been received from that source; but it is known that the mediation was declined in the first instance, and there is no evidence, notwithstanding the lapse of time, that a change of disposition in the British councils has taken place, or is to be expected.

"Under such circumstances, a nation, proud of its rights, and conscious of its strength, has no choice but an exertion of the one in the support of the other.

"To this determination, the best encouragement is derived from the success with which it has pleased the Almighty to bless our arms, both on the land and on the water.

"Whilst proofs have been continued of the enterprise and skill of our cruisers, public and private, on the ocean, and a new trophy gained in the capture of a British by an American vessel of war, after an action giving celebrity to the name of the victorious commander; the great inland waters, on which the enemy were also to be encountered, have presented achievements of our naval arms, as brilliant in their character as they have been important in their consequences.

"On Lake Erie, the squadron under command of Captain Perry having met the British squadron, of superior force, a sanguinary conflict ended in the capture of the whole. The conduct of that officer, adroit, it was daring, and which was so well seconded by his comrades, justly entifies them to the admiration and gratitude of their country; and will fill an early page in its naval annals, with a victory never surpassed in lustre however it may have been in magnitude.

"On Lake Ontario, the caution of the British commander, favored by contingencies, frustrated the efforts of the American commander to bring on a decisive action. Captain Chauncey was able, however, to establish an ascendancy on that important theatre; and to prove, by the manner in which he effected every thing possible, that opportunities only were wanted for a more shining display of his own talents and of the gallantry of those under his command.

"The success on Lake Erie having opened a passage to the territory of the enemy, the officer commanding the north-western army transferred the war thither; and rapidly pursuing the hostile troops, fleeing with their savage associates, forced a general action, which quickly terminated in the capture of the British, and dispersion of the savage force.

"This result is signally honorable to Major-general Harrison, by whose military talents it was prepared; to Colonel Johnson and his mounted volunteers, whose impetuous onset gave a decisive blow to the ranks of the enemy; and to the spirit of the volunteer militia, equally brave and patriotic, who bore an interesting part in the scene: more especially to the chief magistrate of Kentucky at the head of them, whose heroism, signalised in the war which established the independence of his country, sought, at an advanced age, a share in hardships and battles, for maintaining its rights and its safety.

"The effect of these successes has been to rescue the inhabitants of Michigan from their oppressions, aggravated by gross infractions of the capitulation which subjected them to a foreign power: to alienate the savages of numerous tribes from the enemy, by whom they were disappointed and abandoned; and to relieve an extensive region of country from a merciless warfare, which desolated its frontiers, and imposed on its citizens the most harassing services.

"In consequence of our naval superiority on Lake Ontario, and the opportunity afforded by it for concentrating our forces by water, operations, which had been previously planned, were set on foot against the possessions of the enemy on the St. Lawrence. Such, however, was the delay produced, in the first instance, by adverse weather of unusual violence and continuance, and such the circumstances attending the final movements of the army, that the prospect, at one time so favorable, was not realized. The cruelty of the enemy, in enlisting the savages into a war with a nation desirous of mutual emulation in mitigating its calamities, has not been confined to any one quarter. Wherever they could be turned against us, no exertions to effect it have been spared. On our south-western border, the Creek tribes, who, yielding to our persevering endeavours were gradually acquiring more civilised habits, became the unfortunate victims of seduction. A war in that quarter has been the consequence, infuriated by a bloody fanaticism recently propagated among them.

"It was necessary to crush such a war, before it could spread among the contiguous tribes, and before it could favor enterprizes of the enemy into that vicinity. With this view a force was called into the service of the United States, from the states of Georgia and Tennessee, which, with the nearest regular troops, and other corps from the Mississippi territory, might not only chastise the savages into present peace, but make a lasting impression on their fears.

"The progress of the expedition, so far as it is yet known, corresponds with the martial zeal with which it was espoused; and the best hopes of a satisfactory issue are authorised by the complete success with which a well-planned enterprise was executed against a body of hostile savages, by a detachment of the volunteer militia of Tennessee, under the gallant command of General Coffee; and by a still more important victory over a larger body of them, gained under the immediate command of Major-general Jackson; an officer equally distinguished for his patriotism and his military talents.

"The systematic perseverance of the enemy, in courting the aid of the savages in all quarters, had the natural effect of kindling their ordinary propensity to war into a passion, which, even among those best disposed towards the United States, was ready, if not employed on our side, to be turned against us. A departure from our protracted forbearance to accept the services tendered by them has thus been forced upon us. But, in yielding to it, the retaliation has been mitigated as much as possible, both in its extent and in its character, stopping far short of the example of the enemy, who owe the advantages they have occasionally gained in battle, chiefly to the number of their savage associates; and who have not controlled them either from their usual practice of indiscriminate massacre on defenceless inhabitants, or from scenes of carnage without a parallel, on prisoners to the British arms, guarded by all the laws of humanity and honorable war.

"For these enormities, the enemy are equally responsible, whether, with the power to prevent them, they want the will; or, with the knowledge of a want of power, they still avail themselves of such instruments.

"In other respects the enemy are pursuing a course which threatens consequences most afflictive to humanity.

"A standing law of Great Britain naturalizes,

BOOK XI.

CHAP. XI.

1813.

as is well known, all aliens complying with conditions limited to a shorter period than those required by the United States: and naturalised subjects are, in war, employed by her government in common with native subjects. In a contiguous British province, regulations promulgated since the commencement of the war, compel citizens of the United States, being there under certain circumstances, to bear arms, whilst of the native emigrants from the United States, who compose much of the population of the province, a number have actually borne arms against the United States within their limits; some of whom, after having done so, have become prisoners of war, and are now in our possession. The British commander in that province, nevertheless, with the sanction, as appears, of his government, thought proper to select from American prisoners of war, and sent to Great Britain for trial as criminals, a number of individuals, who had emigrated from the British dominions long prior to the state of war between the two nations, who had incorporated themselves into our political society, in the modes recognised by the law and the practice of Great Britain, and who were made prisoners of war, under the banners of their adopted country, fighting for its rights and its safety.

"The protection due to these citizens requiring an effectual interposition in their behalf, a like number of British prisoners of war were put into confinement, with a notification that they would experience whatever violence might be committed on the American prisoners of war sent to Great Britain.

"It was hoped that this necessary consequence of the step unadvisedly taken on the part of Great Britain, would have led her government to reflect on the inconsistencies of its conduct, and that a sympathy with the British, if not with the American sufferers, would have arrested the cruel career opened by its example.

"This was unhappily not the case. In violation both of consistency and humanity, American officers and non-commissioned officers, in double the number of the British soldiers confined here, were ordered into close confinement, with formal notice, that in the event of a retaliation for the death which might be inflicted on the prisoners-of-war sent to Great Britain for trial, the officers so confined would be put to death also. It was notified at the time, that the commanders of the British fleets and armies on our coasts are instructed, in the same event, to proceed with a destructive severity against our towns and their inhabitants.

"That no doubt might be left with the enemy of our adherence to the retaliating resort imposed on us, a correspondent number of British officers, prisoners of war in our hands, were immediately put into close confinement, to abide the fate of those confined by the enemy; and the British government has been apprised of the determination of this government, to retaliate any other proceeding against us, contrary to the legitimate modes of warfare.

"It is as fortunate for the United States, that they have it in their power to meet the enemy in this deplorable contest, as it is honorable to them, that they do not join in it but under the most imperious obligations, and with the humane purpose of effectuating a return to the established usages of war.

"The views of the French government on the subjects which have been so long committed to negotiation, have received no elucidation since the close of your late session. The minister-plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris had not been enabled, by proper opportunities, to press the objects of his mission, as prescribed by his instructions.

"The militia being always to be regarded as the great bulwark of defence and security for free states, and the constitution having wisely committed to the national authority a use of that force, as the best provision against an unsafe military establishment, as well as a resource peculiarly adapted to a country having the extent and the exposure of the United States; I recommend to Congress a revision of the militia-laws, for the purpose of securing, more effectually, the services of all detachments called into the employment and placed under the government of the United States.

"It will deserve the consideration of Congress also, whether, among other improvements in the militia-laws, justice does not require a regulation, under due precautions, for defraying the expense incident to the first assembling as well as to the subsequent movements of detachments called into the national service.

"To give our vessels of war, public and private, the requisite advantage in their cruizes, it is of much importance that they should have, both for themselves and their prizes, the use of the ports of friendly powers. With this view, I recommend to Congress the expediency of such legal provisions as may supply the defects, or remove the doubts of the executive authority, to allow to the cruizers of other powers, at war with enemies of the United States, such use of the American ports and markets as may correspond with the privileges allowed by such powers to American cruizers.

"During the year ending on the 30th of September last, the receipts into the treasury have exceeded 37,000,000 and a half of dollars, of which 24,000,000 were the produce of loans. After meeting all the demands for public service, there remained in the treasury, on that day, near 7,000,000 of dollars. Under the authority contained in the act of the 2d of August last, for borrowing 7,000,000 and a half of dollars, that sum has been obtained on terms more favorable to the United States than those of the preceding loan made during the present year. Further sums to a considerable amount will be necessary to be obtained in the same way during the ensuing year; and from the increased capital of the country, from the fidelity with which the public engagements have been kept, and the public credit maintained, it may be expected, on good grounds, that the necessary pecuniary supplies will not be wanting.

"The expences of the current year, from the multiplied operations falling within it, have necessarily been extensive. But on a just estimate of the campaign, in which the mass of them has been incurred, the cost will not be found disproportionate to the advantages which have been gained. The campaign has indeed, in its latter stages, in one quarter been less favorable than was expected; but in addition to the importance of our naval success, the progress of the campaign has been filled with incidents highly honourable to the American arms.

"The attacks of the enemy on Craney Island, on Fort Meigs, on Sackett's Harbour, and on Sandusky, have been vigorously and successfully repulsed: nor have they in any case succeeded on either frontier, excepting when directed against the peaceable dwellings of individuals, or villages unprepared or undefended.

"On the other hand, the movements of the American army have been followed by the reduction of York, and of Forts George, Erie, and Malden: by the recovery of Detroit, and the extinction of the Indian war in the West; and by the occupancy or command of a large portion of Upper Canada. Battles have also been fought on the borders of the St. Lawrence, which, though not accomplishing their entire objects, reflect honour on the discipline and prowess of our soldiery, the best auguries of eventual victory. In the same scale are to be placed the late successes in the south, over one of the most powerful, which had become one of the most hostile also, of the Indian tribes.

"It would be improper to close this communication, without expressing a thankfulness, in which all ought to unite, for the numerous blessings with which our beloved country continues to be favoured; for the abundance which overspreads our land, and the prevailing health of its inhabitants; for the preservation of our internal tranquillity, and the stability of our free institutions: and above all, for the light of divine truth, and the protection of every man's conscience in the enjoyment of it. And although among our blessings we cannot number an exemption from the evils of war, yet these will never be regarded as the greatest of evils by the friends of liberty and of the rights of nations. Our country has before preferred them to the degrading condition which was the alternative, when the sword was drawn in the cause which gave birth to our national independence: and none who contemplate the magnitude, and feel the value of that glorious event, will shrink from a struggle to maintain the high and happy ground on which it placed the American people.

"With all good citizens, the justice and necessity of resisting wrongs and usurpations no longer to be borne will sufficiently outweigh the privations and sacrifices inseparable from a state of war. But it is a reflection moreover, peculiarly consoling, that whilst wars are generally aggravated by their baneful effects on the internal improvements and permanent prosperity of the nations engaged in them, such is the favoured situation of the United States, that the calamities of the contest into which they have been compelled to enter, are mitigated by improvements and advantages, of which the contest itself is the source.

"If the war has increased the interruptions of our commerce, it has at the same time cherished and multiplied our manufactures, so as to make us independent of all other countries for the more essential branches, for which we ought to be dependent on none; and is even rapidly giving them an extent which will create additional staples in our future intercourse with foreign markets.

"If much treasure has been expended, no inconsiderable portion of it has been applied to objects durable in their value, and necessary to our permanent safety.

"If the war has exposed us to increased spoliations on the ocean, and to predatory incursions on the land, it has developed the national means of retaliating the former, and of providing protection against the latter; demonstrating to all, that every blow aimed at our maritime independence, is an impulse, accelerating the growth of our maritime power.

"By diffusing through the mass of the nation the elements of military discipline and instruction, by augmenting and disturbing warlike preparations applicable to future use, by evincing the zeal and valour with which they will be employed, and the cheerfulness with which every necessary burden will be borne; a greater respect for our rights, and a longer duration of our future peace, are promised, than could be expected without these proofs of the national character and resources.

"The war has proved, moreover, that our free government, like other free governments, though slow in its early movements, acquires in its progress a force proportioned to its freedom; and that the union of these states, the guardian of the freedom and safety of all and of each, is strengthened by every occasion that puts it to the test.

BOOK XI.

CHAP. XI.

1813.

"In fine, the war, with all its vicissitudes, is illustrating the capacity and the destiny of the United States, to be a great, a flourishing, and powerful nation, worthy of the friendship which it is disposed to cultivate with all others; and authorised by its own example, to require from all, an observance of the laws of justice and reciprocity. Beyond these, their claims have never extended; and in contending for these, we behold a subject for our congratulations, in the daily testimonies of increasing harmony throughout the nation, and may humbly repose our trust in the smiles of heaven on so righteous a cause.

"JAMES MADISON."

In the statements and anticipations of some parts of his message, Mr. Madison was justified by what had actually happened; or by what was likely to happen. But certainly, so far as he dwelt upon the military character of the United States, neither what had occurred, nor what in all probability would speedily occur, bore him out: almost every American general and army had fled with precipitation before an inferior force, composed almost entirely of Canadian troops. Wilkinson and Hampton, the last who had fought, had derived no more honour than their predecessors: Sir George Prevost, on the contrary, exhibited his usual activity and courage; and after the defeat of the American generals, he pursued them so closely, that they were forced to take up their winter-quarters in their own territory.

As we have now brought the war in America down to the close of the year 1813, we shall turn our attention to the affairs of Europe.

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE
CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

DC
148
G45
v.1

Gifford, C. H.
History of the wars occasioned by the French revolution

